do not pretend to be a serious analysis of Far Eastern problems. They are a record almost day by day of my own experiences, together with bits of information gathered here and there, descriptions of what I actually saw at first hand, first hand conversations and gossip, sometimes second hand. . . . Intimate glimpses into the lives of Ah Foo, Ivan, and Suzuki, not dry facts about our neighbors on the other side of the Pacific are what we need to make us realize that their problems are our own as well.

It is a dauntless adventurer indeed who thinks that intimate glimpses into the lives of the great or the near-great can be obtained in one-night stands or in single interviews. Mrs. Harrison's lines about the head of the Japanese Federation of Labor show the way she overcame all obstacles:

Organized labor was decidedly weak in Japan but I was very anxious to get an idea of its aims and its extent; so one day I went to call on Mr. Suzuki Bundji, the trades union leader. A few years ago Bundji was constantly persecuted and pursued by the government, but later it changed its tactics with regard to the labor problem and it made a sort of Samuel Gompers of Bundji who was consequently despised by the real laborites as a traitor. I found him an exceedingly fat, smug, self-satisfied little man, full of high-sounding phrases, but obviously insincere, and I could readily believe all the things I heard about him.

That is all. There are no "dry facts" as to why the government changed its tactics with regard to the labor problem and the significance of that change nor is any help given on the dry fact as to who constitute the "real laborites." "Suzuki is fat"; but so is Buddha. Suzuki smiles; but so does the Sphinx. Mrs. Harrison doesn't even recognize the smile on the Sphinx when she encounters it.

The newspapers, the woman movement, and other social forces in Japan Mrs. Harrison dismisses as lightly and as innocently as the labor movement. Otherwise dry facts would have got in the way of personal judgments and hearsay. They would have held her longer in camp. They would have postponed the joy of the open road. But she frankly forestalls all criticism of her work. "I offer no apology," says she.

MARY BEARD

Books in Brief

Cane. By Jean Toomer. Boni and Liveright. $2.

This series of sketches which waver between the short story and the prose poem is sometimes maddeningly difficult to read, because every sentence which one attempts to treat as prose falls into a marked if irregular rhythm, while the next, which one has decided to treat as verse, remains unmistakable prose—but it is worth the effort required. The sketches describe incidents in the life of the modern Negro in the midst of an alien and hostile civilization and they have an emotional tone, mystic, wailing, and melancholy, which is obviously a real expression of a racial spirit never made fully articulate except in music.

Dog and Duck. By Arthur Machen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Machen discusses in a gravely beautiful style the old English game of dog and duck, May-day customs, the obnoxious futility of liberalism, and other such subjects of interest to the Chestertonian conservative and the members of the cakes-and-ale school of modern Catholicism. "The two most extravagant and improbable books in the world," he says for example, "are Euclid and the Arabian Nights; but of the two by far the most improbable and extravagant is Euclid." It is not possible for anyone to fail to admire Mr. Machen as a stylist, but only minds with his own peculiar twist will receive from him intense pleasure.

Poems. By J. E. Spingarn. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

The collected verse of a liberal critic and an established scholar. The results of almost twenty-five years of effort in poetry might have been richer and more varied; but Mr. Spingarn's urge has steadily been toward freedom and beauty, and his work, if somewhat thin, has an impressive integrity.

What the Butler Winked At. By Eric Horne. Thomas Seltzer. $3.

A most amusing and at the same time an enlightening account of life Belowstairs, with a piquant "inside" on the habits of those Above. The grave, slightly illiterate style is humorous as Daisy Ashford's was humorous. And from this composite of details which strive to make a reality of what to most of us is still romance is built up a more subtle picture: the aspect and attitudes of a mind in livery.

You Too. By Roger Burlingame. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

Art, love, and business; one of the eternal triangles. In this case, as in so many, business and love are in league against art. The struggle is set forth in the best American-fiction style, with vigor, color, and humor as the keynotes. The treatment is crisp, if not profound; the characters real, though strangely immature. The most novel feature of the story is that it treats marriage neither as a goal nor a point of departure, but as a relationship to be entered with a realization of crisis, and to continue indefinitely, however unstable its equilibrium. The book aims to be epic; it succeeds in being highly readable.

Other People's Lives. By Henry Albert Phillips. Boni and Liveright. $2.

This analysis of Suburbia deals with material more common to the stage than to the novel. It reads like a digest of the hundred most successful first-year comedies. And it displays the same mixture of semi-farcical event and pseudo-psychic interest which makes these so popular a means of killing time. The characters are shallow, hackneyed, and inconsequential; the book is—to scale.

The Sin-Eater's Hallowe'en. A Fantasy in One Act and Two Scenes. By Francis Neilson. B. W. Huebsch. $1.50.

A fantasy indeed. The important figures of the Peace Conference gather at a lonely inn, steal sandwiches from one another, mistake Uncle Sam for the waiter, and find the Hermit of Doorn the least aggressive war-lord among their whole number. The play turns ingeniously on an old custom of eating Dead-Cakes to absolve the sins of the departed, but the symbolism lacks all subtlety and is leavened with so little reality that it topples of its own weight.

The Gay Ones. By Charles Hansen Towne. The Century Company. $2.

Jaded Long Island flappers of both sexes carry on a grim, hysterical search for unplumbed pleasures. All real interest in this feverish social program soon fades, alike for flappers and reader. The few conclusions which the author draws are quite accurate, but so general and obvious in character as to add little to what has already been said about the modern high-speed dilettante.

Sonnets and Verse. By Hilaire Belloc. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.75.

Mr. Belloc's collected poems, as enthusiastic as they ever were, and quite as shallow.

Drama The Trend

THESE studies of Mr. Dukes are fragmentary. They are evidently passages lifted from reviews of single plays. They contain many sentences very keen-edged in meaning and felicitous in phrasing but not likely to convey much to one who has not a fairly intimate acquaintance with the subject under discussion. What is remarkable about Mr. Dukes's little book is the fine catholicity of his appreciations. He has an apt word to say, this British reviewer, on O'Neill, Richman, Wildrac, Kaiser, Elmer Rice, Capek, Pirandello, Toller, and Unruh. What is strange is that he treats Hauptmann, Shaw, Schnitzler, Porto-Riche as forerunners of these very latest groups of realists, comedians, expressionists, poets and historians, which, on some obscure principle of division, he has established.

The grouping attempted by Mr. Dukes does not conceal the fact that there is nothing new in the drama of our day except that technique of speed and subjectivity which, inspired partly by Strindberg, partly by Wedekind, goes under the name of expressionism. And what is equally clear is that this new genre is essentially unproductive. This barrenness will appear so soon as we compare the rise of expressionism with the rise of realism and naturalism in the drama. No sooner had Antoine founded his Théâtre Libre than solid and profoundly interesting works began to appear. Hervieu, Brieux, Porto-Riche, Ancy, Donnay, and many others came forward. The plays of all these playwrights were not permanent in value. But they all had life, vigor, pertinence. Similarly the Freie Bühne of Berlin produced not only Hauptmann. The contemporary Viennese movement did not produce only Schnitzler. But from Halbe and Hirschfeld and Frau Bernstein to Schönherr the realistic or naturalistic movement had in it the principle of life, of a rich and abundant life.

It was not otherwise with the neo-romantic reaction against the "bitter plays," as Rostand called them, of the Northern school. There was Rostand himself; there was Maeterlinck; there was Richepin; there were the Irish dramatists; there were Hofmannsthal and Hardt and Stucken and Volmoeller and Greiner and Eulenberg. And occasionally there was an isolated drama truly in the grand style, like Richard Beer-Hoffmann's "Der Graf von Charolais" which, significantly enough, they are reviving with marked success in Vienna now. Here as in the naturalistic movement there was life.

One may say, of course, that the war robbed the drama of creative vigor, of creative abundance. Whatever the cause, the fact remains that the "youngest drama," as Mr. Dukes calls it, has the mark, the very fatal mark of barrenness. Mr. Dukes himself still talks of "From Morn to Midnight," of Unruh's "Ein Geschlecht," and is glad to add to these, as I, too, have been, the American examples: "The Hairy Ape," "The Adding Machine." This does not, to be sure, tell the whole story. Mr. Dukes does not know Paul Kornfeld, nor Hans Johst, nor the later things of Hasenclever. He does not, above all, know Franz Werfel. But the works of these men, too—and Werfel is a great poet—have little or no dramatic vitality. Drama, after all, must have spiritual resonance of some sort, directness of appeal, by whatever method achieved. Runes, riddles, pictures, lyrics, tirades, symbols—these have no dramatic effectiveness, no dramatic force and life. And this tenuous, wavering, fundamentally feeble breath flickers also in the chief new playwrights of the Latin peoples—Claudel and Pirandello. We seem to have entered into a period of masks. The strong voice of the drama has been subdued to the gentle chanting of maskers under a dim and ceremonial light.

Prophecy is proverbially foolish and futile. To define the essential character of the present situation may be helpful at least to this extent: it may persuade some gifted playwright to believe that both excellence and fame are today within the reach of him who, liberating himself from the subtleties and symbolisms, the half-lights and half-tones of the hour, lets the eternal voice of man acting and suffering and thus speaking—not hinting or murmuring—arise once more upon those boards which, as Schiller said long ago, are meant to signify and body forth the world.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

LECTURES and DEBATES

Farewell Lecture

by BERTRAND RUSSELL

subject

"How to Be Free and Happy"

AT COOPER UNION, WED. EVE., May 28, at 8:15
NORMAN HAPGOOD, Chairman.

Farewell Committee Headed by

REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES and HEYWOOD BROWN

Tickets—83c and $1.10—All Seats Reserved. For Sale, starting May 9, at Rand School, 7 E. 15th St. and Civic Club, 14 W. 12th St. Auspices Free Youth. Room 504, 7 East 15th St. Stuyvesant 4620.

LABOR TEMPLE, 14th St. & 2nd Ave.

DR. WILL DURANT lectures

Sundays at 5 P. M., Wednesdays at 8:30 P. M.

May 18: Remy de Gourmont May 21: Bertrand Russell
June 1: Gerhart Hauptmann June 4: John Dewey
June 15: Artzibashev June 18: Santayana

Admission 25 cents.

DEBATE—Resolved: That Communism Is Impracticable

Affirmative: WILL DURANT

Chairman:

Negative: HARRY WATON

HARRY DANA

Labor Temple, 14th St. & 2d Ave., 8:15 p.m. sharp, May 22.

All tickets at 75 cents; sale limited to 700; obtainable at 239 East 14th St.

The DEBATE
of the Day!

BERTRAND
RUSSELL

VERSUS

SCOTT

NEARING

Chairman

SAMUEL UTERMAYER

SUBJECT:

Can the SOVIET IDEA
take hold of AMERICA ENGLAND
and FRANCE?

RESOLVED: That the Soviet form of government is applicable to Western civilization

MR. RUSSELL, Negative

MR. NEARING, Affirmative

Sunday, May 25th, 1924, at 3 P.M.

CARNEGIE HALL, 57th St. and 7th Avenue

Tickets: $3.00, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00 plus war tax

On sale at Carnegie Hall Box Office, 57th St. and 7th Ave.

Jimmie Higgins Book Shop, 127 University Pl., nr. 14th

Gothic Art Book Shop, 127-2nd Ave., near 12th St.

Maisel's Book Store, 421 Grand St., cor. Attorney

Epstein's Drug Store, 1674 Madison Ave., near 110th St.

M. Stern's Jewelry Store, 1337 Wilkins Ave., Bronx.

Katz's Drug Store, 78 Graham Ave., Williamsburg.

Neidorf's Book Store, 1817 Pitkin Ave., Brownsville.

or by mail and in person at offices of

The League for Public Discussion

500 Fifth Ave., New York Longacre 10435-6384

The Youngest Drama. Studies of Fifty Dramatists. By Ashley Dukes. Chicago: Charles H. Sergel and Company. $2.50.

International Relations Section

The Decline of German Labor

By BORIS STERN

IN the smoke of battle between the government printing presses and the mark, the German working class suffered a terrific blow. Trapped in the maze of zeros the individual workman could not for a moment turn his eyes away from his daily cares to see what was happening immediately outside his family circle, to his union or the labor movement as a whole. There were, of course, some who profited from this abnormal situation. In spite of the constant fall of the mark a rapid move in buying his necessities was often sufficient to recompense a worker for the losses he suffered in getting paid in paper marks. Everyone who could only spare his millions or billions and later trillions of marks for a day or so to acquire some foreign currency did so.

But this abnormal condition was suddenly brought to a stop. The stabilization of the mark in the last days of November, as a result of the introduction of the rentenmark and the decision of the Government to give up printing more paper notes, the introduction of the gold-mark reckoning in the retail businesses and in the payment of wages brought the mass of German workmen and salaried employees face to face with the naked reality. The high nervous tension of the days of the falling mark is disappearing from their faces. They know today—if they still have jobs—how much they are getting for their work and what they can do with it.

It seems to be the fate of Germany to present the world with the most curious economic phenomena—this time, a combination of a depreciating currency with a rapidly growing unemployment problem. The number of unemployed in Germany began to rise at the end of July, just when the mark experienced the first really tremendous fall—one gold mark in July was on the average worth 33,000 paper marks, while the August average value was 585,000 paper marks. The paper mark experienced the following sensational drops:

- 1 gold mark in August was worth 585,000 paper marks.
- 1 gold mark in September was worth 15 million paper marks.
- 1 gold mark in October was worth 5 billion paper marks.
- 1 gold mark in November was worth over 1 trillion paper marks.

Since November the paper mark has, in general, been stabilized at one trillion paper marks to one gold mark. Meanwhile, the number of unemployed jumped from 6.3 per cent, according to the government reports in August, to 9.9 per cent of the same basis in September, 19.1 per cent in October, and 23.4 per cent in November. The government figures are based upon the registered membership of the three big trade-union organizations, Socialist, Catholic, and Hirsch-Dunker, including the mass of the German industrial workers. The figures for various industries in January, 1924, were:

Industry	Trade-Union Membership (Round Figures)	Per Cent (Unemployed)	Per Cent (Part Time)
Metal	1,352,000	27.1	60.2
Textile	687,000	9.4	16.4
Building Trades....	496,000	71.1	8.5
Transportation	437,000	18.5	13.5
Woodworkers	383,000	21.9	17.0
Foodstuffs	240,000	14.4	8.9
Leather	199,000	13.7	18.0
Clothing	166,000	20.8	10.5
Stone and Marble...	128,000	43.8	14.6
Printing	108,000	21.4	14.2
Bookbinding	63,000	27.6	30.9
Other industries together	1,000,000	23.2	20.6
Total	5,259,000	26.5

With such a rate of unemployment what are the conditions of those workers who have been lucky enough to retain their jobs? What are their wages and hours of work?

In the printing industry the wages were put on a gold-mark basis on November 9. In the agreement signed on that date and covering the entire country the wages were set for the week of November 10-16 at 25 gold marks, 72.72 per cent of the pre-war wage, and for the period of November 17-December 31 at 27 gold marks per week, or 78.53 per cent of the pre-war wage. This is the wage of a first-class printer, and includes the highest payment to which a married man with a wife and two minor children is entitled. In the chemical industry a skilled first-class worker in Berlin received in the period of November 21-December 11 a wage of 24.96 gold marks per week, 78.53 per cent of his pre-war wage, and an unskilled factory laborer received 22.80 gold marks per week, or more than 90 per cent of the wage he received prior to the war.

In the Berlin metal industry a skilled first-class worker was being paid on December last at the rate of 31.44 gold marks for a 48-hour week, or 77 per cent of the pre-war wage, and the unskilled worker received precisely the same proportion of his pre-war wage of 30.52 gold marks. On January 3, 1924, the wage agreement was suddenly broken up by the Association of the Metal Employers of Greater Berlin, and more than 150,000 metal workers were thrown out of their shops because of the refusal of their union to agree to a 14 per cent all-around cut in their wages. The newly appointed government arbitrator for the city of Berlin immediately invited the representatives of the two sides for a conference in his office, but the employers refused to recognize his authority because of his political and trade-union affiliations. (He was a Socialist and had belonged to the Metal Workers' Union.) The new agreement finally signed calls for a reduction of from 4 to 5 per cent instead of the 14 per cent demanded.

UNEMPLOYMENT PERCENTAGE IN GERMANY

1923-1924

All trades union members as registered with the Government.

The Government too has gone over to a gold-mark basis of remunerating its employees and officials. The employees are put on a weekly wage of 24 gold marks for the skilled workers, 64.06 per cent of their pre-war earnings, and 20.64 gold marks for the unskilled workers, 65.9 per cent of the pre-war wage. Higher officials receive up to 78.04 per cent of their former salaries.

Although the earnings of the great majority of the German workers and salaried employees thus average 25 to 35 per cent below their pre-war standard, and this does not take note of the general 10 per cent employment tax deducted at the source of income, the prices of foodstuffs and other immediate necessities in February were still above their 1913-1914 level and this in spite of the sensational drop in the last day of November and in the first week of December. Retail prices seem to have stabilized somewhat as follows:

Article	Price 1913-1914 Average	Price Month of Feb. 4, 1924 Gold Mark	Per Cent of 1913-1914 Average
Black bread, per lb. (500 grams)	.14	.14	100
Beef	.88	1.10	125
Potatoes	.04	.04	100
Lard	.70	.80	114
Butter	1.35	2.50	190
Margarine	.90	.75	83
Rice	.25	.24	96
Sugar	.22	.44	200
Eggs (each)	.09	.20	220
Milk, per liter	.24	.33	138
Laur. lry soap (bar)	.25	.30	120
Haircut	.25	.80	320
Car fare	.10	.15	150

Rents alone were still on a paper-mark basis and far below the 1913-1914 average. But on February 1 gold-mark rents were introduced, beginning a rate of 28 per cent of the pre-war basis, to be followed by monthly increases of 5 per cent until in a little over a year the full pre-war rents will be reestablished.

The employers naturally find this a favorable moment to attack the eight-hour day.* They had never really reconciled themselves to it; the 1922 report of the United Employers' Associations of Germany maintained that unless the eight-hour day was abandoned Germany would never be able to rise from the chaos into which it had been plunged by the revolution.

Hugo Stinnes said on November 9, 1922:

I do not regard the eight-hour day merely as a question with which the working class alone is concerned, but as a problem upon which the entire industry and with it all Germany is at stake. I believe that the leaders of the unions will soon realize that if the workers are to make a living . . . they will have to work more, two hours more per day.

His prophecy has come true. The German working class is now living in a state of misery and starvation and is no longer in a position to defend itself against the attack of the employers. The eight-hour day is rapidly becoming a thing of the past in practice if not in theory. The Government has modified the eight-hour laws by decrees.

The spirit of cooperation between the employers and the union-organized workers represented in the Joint councils (Arbeitsgemeinschaften) has been completely thrown overboard. Full play is given to the frank and brutal methods of the class struggle of the pre-revolutionary days, so much so that wherever they see the slightest chance of success the employers refuse to recognize the unions and again make separate agreements with the individual workers.

Meanwhile, of course, the trade-union organizations have suffered by the fall of the mark and the poverty of their members. By last November the general offices of the Trade Union Federation, as well as the individual unions, were absolutely without funds, without a press, and, some might say, even without a membership. All the works-council papers, and some of the trade weeklies which had been in existence for thirty-five to forty years, had ceased to appear, while most of the others appeared irregularly, whenever the union could secure enough funds to put one issue across. The stabilization of the mark, however, has saved the unions—a new spirit begins to make itself felt within the ranks and among the leaders of the unions, a spirit of consolidation in preparation for the coming struggle. The press is beginning to reappear regularly, although in a very diminished form, mostly one sheet of about seven inches by ten. The general office in Berlin, although forced to discharge more than half its own employees, and to replace the Correspondenzblatt (a weekly which owes its birth to the big strikes of 1891), the Betriebsrätezeitung, the Gewerkschaftliche Frauenzeitung, and the irregular Gewerkschaftliche Nachrichtendienst by a single new weekly, the Gewerkschaftszeitung, has already issued the call to the mobilization. The eight-hour day has been lost, and the workers will have to make other concessions in their unequal struggle against reaction, but the trade unions remain, and with them remains the only element upon which a real democratic Germany can be built—if at all.

Women of All Lands, Unite!

By HELEN BUCKLER

ALTHOUGH members of the Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom were heralded by certain superpatriots as "representatives of sovietism," and threatened with the surveillance of both the War Department and the Department of Justice, with an added hint of direct violent intervention on the part of the American Legion, nevertheless one hundred delegates, representing the internationally minded women of thirty-two countries, conducted their fourth biennial congress in Washington, D. C., the first week in May. Intolerance or even ridicule could be of but small moment to a group of women who had never counted expediency among their virtues and who first came together to cry out for peaceable ways when half the world was pooled in blood and passions ran even higher than they do in the backwaters of Washington today.

* In a subsequent issue we shall publish an account by Sylvia Kopald of the attack on the eight-hour day throughout Europe.

In 1915 there were fourteen countries, belligerent as well as neutral, represented in the International Congress of Women that met at the Hague, and two thousand persons attended the meetings. Resolutions embodying many of the principles afterwards expressed in the Fourteen Points were carried by special delegates to the governments of fourteen countries and forty-three private conferences were held with high officials.

This year, without the high pitch set by a dramatic background of active war and with the discouragement of a world armed again to the teeth, France still illegally in the Ruhr, the United States wantonly slapping Japan in the face, the Woman's International League met again "to find a way to reorganize international relations through the political and economic and spiritual forces which underlie all human endeavor." They did not, of course, in fourteen sessions and six public meetings completely envisage a new international order, and Dr. Williams of England pointed out that to do so would only be "to hang new chains on our necks."

Although some vitality was undoubtedly taken from the congress by an extended preliminary executive meeting and while most of the foreign delegates had talked themselves out during the week on board ship, still there was animated discussion—not of principle, for that had been settled long ago—but of method and next steps.

"We cannot condemn the violence and not the causes" stated the manifesto of aims and plan for work unanimously adopted by the congress. Moreover, "we devote ourselves to abolishing these causes. The first step toward this end must be to bring about the organization of economic life not for individual or class profit but for the highest possible development of every human being." Once more the congress declared for an international organization, based not on force but the welded moral opinion of the world, comprising all countries in genuine equality, working to protect minorities, improve conditions of labor, promote international education and health, the welfare of backward races, establishment of free trade, equitable distribution of food supplies and raw materials among the nations, and the total disarmament of its members.

It was indicative of the desire for practicability present in a large element of the congress that a hundred persons gathered one day in the interlude between sessions and again the next day and the next to discuss and compare the ways and means of labor banks, cooperative guilds, reduced taxation on buildings with corresponding increases on unimproved land, cooperative housing, trade unionism and employment, illness and endowment insurance in the United States and abroad.

The executive committee recommended and the congress accepted without discussion a rewording and clarification of the objects of the League:

The Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom aims at binding together women in every country who oppose all war and all preparation for war, whether offensive or defensive, international or civil. They believe in and work for complete and universal disarmament on land, on sea, and in the air; for the abolition of the hunger blockade and of the prostitution of science for destructive purposes; world organization for social, political, and economic cooperation; social, political, and economic equality for all without distinction of sex, race, class, and creed; moral disarmament through education in the spirit of human unity and through the establishment of social justice.

The United States Section considerably democratized its constitution and tied up the statement of its objects more specifically to those of the international organization. This was an abstract affair. When it came to passing a concrete resolution backing up the proposed equal-rights blanket amendment, a convinced majority was lacking. The women of the local section were much more willing to accept ideals and ultimate goals than "next steps"; there was a discouraging evidence that only a few United States members were politically and economically informed.

Numerous excellent resolutions were passed by both the United States Section and the International Congress, but perhaps the real keynote of the meeting should be found in Ellen Key's message: "I have no belief in resolutions of congresses, but I believe in martyrs, men and women moved by faith in their ideals." Of these the W. I. L. has a goodly number and in these lie its strength and perhaps the world's hope.

Unamuno

THE following protest against the exile of Don Miguel de Unamuno was recently issued by the Catalonian Cultural Committee of New York City:

What has been done by the military directorate in Spain has no precedents, even in Russian Czarism or Italian Fascism. Czarism never treated Tolstoi or Dostoevski as the Spanish General Primo de Rivera has treated the Spanish thinker Don Miguel de Unamuno.

Don Miguel de Unamuno is in Spain what Tolstoi was in Russia, what D'Annunzio is in Italy, Anatole France in France, Maeterlinck in Belgium, Bernard Shaw in England. He is the glory of the Spanish nation. Don Miguel de Unamuno has made Spanish culture famous. The depth and human understanding of his work remove it from the barriers of nations and the bonds of time. His work has been translated into all languages, and has been studied and discussed throughout the world. He has created power and beauty.

Don Miguel de Unamuno, professor of Greek at the University of Salamanca, and dean of it as well, has done a great work. This old university, which once rivaled the University of Paris and was the nucleus of the greatest culture of the Spanish Renaissance, was proud to have at its head the most important intellectual in Spain. Professor, novelist, teacher, critic, poet, the finest poet in Spain today, Señor Unamuno is furthermore the great agitator of modern Spanish and European life. His press campaigns, keen, able, and stimulating, found their response in the youth and life of Spain. It is for this reason that Don Miguel de Unamuno was removed from his post and taken to Fuerte Ventura, a small island lost in the Atlantic, where the excessively hot climate will soon destroy the health of the great writer.

General Primo de Rivera attempted to justify his absurd action by saying that Señor Unamuno was not fulfilling his duties at the university. But this is a lie and a base slander, because, according to the testimony of the entire faculty of the University of Salamanca, he is a model professor and dean. . . .

It must be frankly admitted that Don Miguel de Unamuno was exiled because he was an enemy. A pretext was sought. A letter from Miguel de Unamuno to Señor Solalinde, Spanish instructor in a North American university, fell into the hands of Señor Americo Castro, a well-known Spanish professor, who is living in New York, and that gentleman turned the letter over to the magazine Nosotros of Buenos Aires, which published it. In this letter Señor Unamuno, like every good Spaniard, spoke of the directorate in harsh terms. These terms, which are mild in comparison to those heard in Spain and among groups of Spaniards abroad, and which give a mere shadow of the truth, were the cause of the sentence imposed.

In Spain the courageous intelligentsia have always been persecuted; all effective attempts at reform have always been suppressed by force. The high clergy, the nobility, the military caste, the monarchy are supported by the ignorance and poverty of the people. All that is really alive in Spain must face their opposition. . . . The Spanish military directorate, which poses as redeemer, is but the continuation of the history of Spain, black, reactionary, and ferocious.

Yet the directorate does not know what it has done in exiling Don Miguel de Unamuno. . . . The intellectuals throughout the world have taken up the cudgels, and the Unamuno case is becoming a repetition of the case of Ferrer, who was assassinated in Montjuich by the monarchical and clerical reaction in Spain. The manifesto of French intellectuals, signed by the best men of France, is only the first move of protest. The reaction will break out everywhere. . . .

The End of the Kiev Trial

THE recent trial of the members of the counter-revolutionary organization known as the Kiev branch of the Center of Action created much excitement outside of Russia owing to the interference of Premier Poincaré, who demanded clemency for a number of intellectuals involved in the trial. The Poincaré note was received with much resentment in the Soviet Republic. Among the protests voiced was the following statement by the defendants in the trial published in the Kiev press:

Upon learning of the Poincaré telegram which protests against the fate of some of us, we declare that, although depressed by the severe sentence, we recognize that any interference of a foreign government in the affairs of the republic is inadmissible. Our trial is exclusively a matter of the internal life of our union state and the final decision concerning our fate is up to the highest organs of our republic.

(Signed) CONSTANTIN VASSILENKO, NIKOLAI VASSILENKO, CHOLGANSKY, SMIRNOV, YAKOVLEV, ONISHCHENKO - PAVLIUK, CHEBAKOV, YEDINEVSKY, TOLPIGA, VINOGRADOVA, KAPOCINSKAYA LEONIDA and ZINAIDA, KUTZEVALOVA.

The sentence of all the accused was commuted and the trial referred to the Ukrainian supreme court in Kharkov.

CHALFONTE-HADDON HALL ATLANTIC CITY

For more than fifty years, these two hospitable, homelike hotels have been the choice of cultivated interesting people—bent on happy health-giving days by the sea. Golf and yacht club privileges. American Plan Only. Always Open.

Reasonable rates. Write today for illustrated folder
LEEDS AND LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

Read

Eurekanian Paternalism of the Proposed New State in the Realm of Utopia

With aims and plans of procedure for the development of the latent qualities and resources inherent in society under advanced organization, production and distribution. 25 pages.

The Day of Judgment and the Celestial Missionaries of Life

A novel containing a fanciful discourse on present-day problems and possible happenings of the future, with new scientific theories regarding the forces of nature. 70 pages.

John Barleycorn Personified

A story in verses of twenty-nine stanzas with a fanciful dialogue on the liquor problem.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR, THREE BOOKLETS, POSTPAID

LOUIS PAUER, 2294 West 30th St., Cleveland, O.

PLEXO "TOILET LANOLINE"

—the year-round
skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 28, 1924

No. 3073

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	597
EDITORIALS:
A Cheerful and Promising Outlook	600
Midsummer Madness	601
Another Newspaper Tragedy	601
The Majesty of the Law	602
THE JEWISH BABBIT. By Bertha Wallerstein	603
CAN MEN AND WOMEN BE FRIENDS? By Floyd Dell	605
ISLANDS. By Laura Benét	606
GLASS WALLS. By William Hard	607
FASCIST TERRORISM IN THE TYROL. By Robert Dell	609
BOOKS FOR AMBASSADORS. By Carl Van Doren	611
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	611
CORRESPONDENCE	612
POEMS TO MINNA. By Maxwell Bodenheim	613
BOOKS:
Andrew Mellon's Ignorance. By Henry Raymond Mussey	613
Admirable Anatole. By Lucien Price	615
The Freudian Drama. By Joseph Jastrow	615
Elegy. By Ludwig Lewisohn	616
An Early Idyll. By Joseph T. Shipley	617
Books in Brief	617
DRAMA:
"June and the Paycock." By Edward Alden Jewell	617
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Justice in the Field. By Henry Longan Stuart	620
The Present Rulers of Germany. By Boris Stern	621

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN

LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE

ROBERT HERRICK

JOHN A. HOBSON

H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS

CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

CALVIN COOLIDGE'S CHIEF HOPE of victory lies in the continuance of good times. But these are disappearing. The conditions in the textile trade are bad; those in the automobile business dubious. One of the largest carpet companies in Connecticut has shut down without notice, throwing 3,200 employees out of work. In the steel industry only 65 per cent of the plants are at work. Many of the Pennsylvania blast furnaces have shut down; a number of the Eastern iron mines have stopped work. In the Northwest the bank failures continue, among them a large trust company in St. Paul. Government reports show a distinct slackening all along the line. Unemployment is increasing and wages are falling, both in the agricultural districts and among large employers of out-door labor. In certain sections we are back to thirty cents an hour for unskilled workers. Now it may well be that we shall pass through another period of deflation of wages before reaching a normal basis, but that process does not spell success at the polls for the party holding office in Washington. The daily press is as silent as possible about this slackening, and the Coolidge Administration speaks not at all, in the hope that if not dwelt upon people will not realize its gravity. If he had dared talk of it, this dangerous condition of affairs would have given the President his best argument for his bonus veto. With business falling off and unemployment growing, Congress has no right to burden the government with further enormous expenditures. Finally, if Congress does not do something for the farmer Coolidge will have no show at all in the rural sections.

THE PASSAGE OF THE BONUS BILL over the President's veto is a grave economic and moral blunder. It will not give adequate compensation to the service men and it will place a serious financial burden upon the whole of the country. To our minds the veterans themselves will pay dearly for it. Yet there was a great popular demand for it, and it is the sovereign right of a democracy to blunder as often as it will. We have no doubt whatever that if the bonus had been submitted to a national referendum, as it should have been, it would have been voted by the country as a whole. The reasons for this support of the bonus we have frequently set forth. It grows out of genuine grievances in addition to the firm belief that the soldiers did not get a square deal in the matter of pay. The public knows that many of the disabled men have been outrageously treated, that the "solicitude of the nation" of which Mr. Coolidge spoke in his veto message has been anything but a genuine and honest solicitude. The public knows that the big profiteers have not been caught and that the big grafters have gone scot-free with all their plunder. Many feel that a country which contrary to its best traditions drafted millions of its men without regard to their wishes ought to be made to pay a great deal more than the bonus calls for. A desire to "get even" with the government has, therefore, played a part in the President's defeat. But he, too, did not help. His method of approach made few converts and infuriated many. He has no personal popularity in Washington to aid him. And so he has had to accept a severe drubbing, for all that he stood by his guns and was justified in his stand. We hope he will do as well on the issue of Japanese exclusion.

AFTER THIS EXHIBITION of President Coolidge's lack of ability to lead his own party—its leaders, Henry Cabot Lodge among them, deserted him to help overrule his veto when only three more votes were needed to sustain it—the folly of nominating him for the Presidency ought to be apparent to the veriest child. As the New York World rightly puts it, "he is to be nominated, but is neither feared, respected, nor obeyed, and the same forces which set up a puppet President in 1920 are at the same game in 1924." Never was there a more extraordinary spectacle in American political life. Mr. Coolidge has done nothing since he was in office to reveal him as more than the third-rate man he is. He has done nothing to purge our public life of the corruption revealed. On the contrary, he has sat silently while the forces of his Government have been used to assail those who wished to uncover the rottenness and cleanse our national good name. He has stood firm only on those things in which his masters, the big business men of the country, were profoundly interested—reduction of supertaxes and the killing of the bonus. A cynic might wish that Mr. Coolidge would be elected President for the satisfaction of seeing how disgusted with their puppet the business world would be long before his four years were up. Mr. Harding's Administration wound up in shame and disgrace. Mr. Coolidge's, we venture to prophesy, would be as discredited.

FOUR UNITED STATES SENATORS, after investigation and examination of the grand-jury records, have signed a report which "wholly exonerates Senator Burton K. Wheeler from any and all violation" of the law, and adds that "he observed at all times not only the letter but the spirit of the law." One member of the committee, the lame-duck Senator Sterling, made an equivocal separate report, but among the four signers was Senator McNary, as staunch an Administration supporter as the gentleman from South Dakota. Thus ends another chapter in one of the most barefaced political chicaneries in the history of the United States. Senator Wheeler began to investigate Mr. Daugherty. Thereupon Mr. Daugherty assembled in his apartment at night Mr. Burns, the goblin-chasing detective; Mr. Lockwood, secretary of the Republican National Committee; and Mr. Lockwood's henchman Blair Coan. Blair Coan was sent West, and persuaded a federal office-holder to ask a grand jury to indict Senator Wheeler on trumped-up evidence. The indictment was issued, and the newspapers which had been defending Daugherty and the Administration thereupon blackened Senator Wheeler's character with howls of glee. Senator Wheeler called the indictment a frame-up, and asked the Senate to investigate his acts. A committee, headed by Senator Borah, studied the grand-jury records, heard every witness who had anything to say, and now reports complete exoneration. Do the newspapers take back their editorial soot? Does the President, or the Department of Justice, or the Republican National Committee take steps to punish or even disavow those guilty of such barefaced fraud? Listen; they are as silent as the hills.

PHILIP GROSSMAN, the Chicago saloonkeeper who was sentenced to prison for contempt of court in violating an injunction restraining him from selling liquor, deserves to be behind the bars, as we say in another column. Mr. Coolidge was no doubt misled in pardoning him, but it is piling one mistake on another for Federal Judges James H. Wilkerson and George A. Carpenter to deny the Presidential right of clemency and commit Grossman to jail. The judges base their ruling on the ground that the President may pardon a person guilty of a crime, but that contempt of court is not a crime, and so the President may not exercise his powers in connection with it. That this ruling is inconsistent with previous practice would seem to be established by the recently uncontested action of the President in pardoning Comptroller Craig of New York City after he had been sentenced to jail for contempt by Judge Mayer.

MORE IMPORTANT than that it violates precedent is the fact that this ruling is another step in the assertion of judicial supremacy in the United States—an announcement that the courts need only fall back on contempt of court in order to make themselves supreme monarchs. Contempt of court is not a crime, say the judges, and therefore not pardonable. Exactly; but if it is not a crime, why should men be imprisoned for it and that merely on a judge's say-so? Of course the violation of a court order ought to be punishable, but it should be made a crime by statute, subject to a jury trial and the constitutional guaranty of "due process of law" which our judges are so eager to uphold when it concerns anyone but themselves. The power that judges exercise through contempt of court is a monstrous anachronism and a relic of sheer absolutism.

CAPTAIN PAXTON HIBBEN refuses to let the War Department tire him out in his fight for justice at its hands. The controversy arose a year ago after Captain Hibben was examined for promotion in the Reserve Corps. His promotion to the rank of major was recommended, but the War Department bureaucrats refused to follow such a course because they disliked Captain Hibben's opinions, especially his advocacy of the recognition of Soviet Russia. The War Department felt obliged to take some action, however, and so directed a board to inquire into his fitness for promotion. When Captain Hibben was allowed to appear before this board last autumn he discovered that it had already held two sessions, and he was not permitted to see the evidence which had been submitted against him by the War Department. Six months later he was told by the War Department that he might look over this evidence, but he discovered that important documents had been withdrawn.

MEANWHILE THE INVESTIGATING BOARD took no further action and the case slumbered until May 2, last, when the War Department dissolved the investigating board, at the same time authorizing a new one. The new board is directed to inquire not into the fitness of Captain Hibben for promotion but "to retain a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps." It is ordered that Captain Hibben shall see all the evidence presented to this board but that no records shall be submitted that would be "against the public interest." Captain Hibben contends that the intention is to cover up the trail of underhand and oppressive espionage that has been employed against him, and in place of an irregular investigation conceived in hostility he demands a trial in the prescribed way—by a court of inquiry. We hope he will accept nothing less, and will not let his patience be exhausted by these attempts secretly to blacken the character of a man, followed by subterfuge and evasion when proof is demanded.

THERE IS A STIRRING in the church. War-time support of the business of killing has left many a pastor and layman uneasy. In all the denominations voices are being raised demanding that the church refuse ever again to bless war. A poll of Unitarian ministers (in which, to be sure, most of the ministers failed to vote) produced a slight majority in favor of a resolution refusing cooperation with governments waging war—an amazing result in a group which, once the vanguard, has latterly seemed to slumber in contented respectability. The Methodists have shown the most progressive front of any of the large denominations. Their Committee on the State of the Church actually reported to the Quadrennial Convention, by a vote of 76 to 37, an out-and-out pacifist resolution, refusing to admit that any war whatever could be righteous. The convention, however, could not quite bring itself to so daring a statement, and its final action will probably make exceptions for "wars of defense" and "wars in defense of humanity." But the ferment is working; and the number grows of those who admit the impossibility of such hair-splitting.

ELEVEN SUICIDES by gas poisoning on one day have resulted in Berlin's turning over to the Fire Department rather than to the ambulance service the duty of attending to these pitiful cases of despair. Those who kill themselves daily in Germany are not social wrecks, nor outcasts, nor criminals. Many of them are people of refinement, education, and social position, who by reason of their age and loss of all financial reserves deliberately take their lives to avoid slow starvation or to relieve others of the burden of their support. The plight of the old people is terrible, indeed, for private means, insurance, and old-age pensions have all gone by the board. In Heidelberg, recently, a distinguished chemist killed himself because, being in the late sixties, he could obtain no employment. From Berlin comes a letter of appeal on behalf of a worthy couple sixty-eight years of age who are totally destitute and see nothing but starvation ahead of them. Everywhere one turns in Germany cases of this kind confront one, and yet one still hears doubts as to whether Germany really needs aid. Not only should America send three times the three millions which have been raised to date by General Allen's committee for the German children; it should be sending at least three millions for the destitute old people of Germany who spend their days wondering when they may die.

IF THE GODS ON OLYMPUS ever laughed they are laughing now. Over what? Why, over our new immigration law. Not over the Japanese exclusion, of course; they can only have tears for that shocking exhibition of lack of tolerance in the American nation. No, the Olympians are convulsed with mirth over the quotas to be admitted to the United States, for they recall how the heavens resounded only six years ago with abuse of the wicked "Huns," those savages who ought to have been exterminated as not fit for human association. They recall, too, what praises were sung to our beloved Allies and how we were united to them forever in indissoluble ties of love and affection welded by joint sacrifices and joint suffering in trench and on sea. That was 1918. Today, in 1924, we have passed a law allowing more than five times as many immigrants from Germany as from all the Allied countries together, excepting only England—from which country we will accept 62,558. From Germany we will admit 50,229, but from our beloved France we now permit to enter our confines only 3,978 men and women. For Italy, too, we bled, fought, and died, but of her sons we will take only 3,989 a year. As for Belgium, that heroic little country, only 609 of its people are to enter our country each twelve months. And this is called legislating with sanity, in accord with the true American spirit!

TO BE A MEMBER of the jury of recommendations for the Pulitzer prizes is to be one of the least important of men. The third vice-president of the Daughters of the American Revolution may have less authority, but her lack of it is not so conspicuous. The saddest feature of the Pulitzer business from the jurors' point of view is that some of them have taken their jobs seriously and have worked on them. William Lyon Phelps admits that he and his committee spent a busy winter attending plays in view of the advice that they would be expected to give in the spring. At the proper time the committee recommended to the Advisory Board that it award the Pulitzer dramatic prize to "The Show-Off." The Advisory Board (which has final authority, despite its name), not satisfied by this recommendation, disregarded it, awarded the prize to Hatcher Hughes's "Hell-Bent fer Heaven," and left the jurors to discover the fact through the newspapers. A similar discourtesy occurred four years ago when a committee consisting of Robert Morss Lovett, Stuart P. Sherman, and Hamlin Garland was overruled in the award of the novel prize to "The Age of Innocence" after it had voted for "Main Street." The statement from Columbia that four out of the five recommendations made this year were ignored in the awards should convince the most public-spirited juror that he could use his time to better advantage at almost any other occupation. The real victim of the affair, however, is, ironically enough, the recipient of the award. Mr. Hughes, whom the Advisory Board sought to distinguish, must wish they had left him alone.

AS WILLIAM HARD suggests on another page of this issue, democracy lapses easily into tyranny. He cites as examples of this tendency the unwillingness of the majority in certain States to let individuals send their children to the sorts of schools they choose, and the eagerness of the majority to peep into the private ledgers of private citizens. But how much more blatant is the tyranny of democracy as it appears in the small commonwealth of Smith College, where certain students have recently been suspended for breaking, among others, the law which forbids them to smoke. Smoking is made a legal offense by the Smith students themselves; and breaking it becomes a form of sedition, a proof to the world that student government, or democracy, is itself a failure. Such is the solemn temper of the earnest self-governor. The Nation wants to believe in democracy—especially in student democracies—but it deplores their solemnity. Rules against smoking, rules against walking without hats, rules against speaking to young men on Sunday—one and all the rules that college students love to make to keep themselves in the paths of virtue—add mountains to our sum of skepticism; and the young women who smoke if they choose despite the rules that would pin propriety on them like a rose—well, they make us almost believe that some day college students and people generally will grow up enough to produce a form of "self-government" that does not belie its name.

MEMORIAL DAY is still the most solemn and impressive of our holidays, no richer in tradition than Thanksgiving Day or July 4, but without the paraphernalia of firecrackers and roast turkey that have obscured the meaning of those days of joy. But it is a pity that we should confine our respect on May 30 to death in war. Last year a group of Cincinnati citizens united in enlarging the significance of the day by scattering flowers on the graves of some of the unsung martyrs of peace. One of the speakers recalled William James's plea for a moral equivalent for war. Another read Horace Traubel's words:

We worship the destroyer. We despise or at least ignore the builder. . . . You look with awe upon a battlefield. Do you not look with as much awe upon a tunnel? Here is an honest battle. A battle with the rocks. . . . Here is a battle in which no brother takes up arms against a brother. Yet this battle, too, has its victims.

Should we not enlarge our Memorial Day so that instead of commemorating only the heroes of our wars it should include also the miners suffocated while digging our coal, the workers caught in our machinery, the everyday victims, no less truly conscripted, of peace?

A Cheerful and Promising Outlook

WE want all our readers to join with us in our satisfaction over the clearing international skies, the almost daily proofs that we are gaining headway against the forces which make for obscurantism and reaction, for international hatreds and wars. It is the extraordinary French political overturn which still gives us chief cause for rejoicing. For years we have maintained, in the face of the most caustic contradiction and criticism, that the Poincaré Government did not represent the heart and conscience of the bulk of the great French people; that if its policies were tolerated it was chiefly because the masses were without a press to express their views. We have never been able to feel that so brilliant and gifted a people would submit indefinitely to being the pawns of a government by and for their sordid big-business men of the type of those constituting the Comité des Forges. And behold, our faith is justified! More than that, we are, despite the wabbling of Herriot as to the Ruhr and the insincerities and opportunism of M. Briand, optimistic enough to believe that under the skilful leadership of Ramsay MacDonald a way will be found to build a bridge on which the French troops may march out of the Ruhr before many months have passed. Indeed, there is already a report that Poincaré is himself moving in that direction.

As for Mr. MacDonald's Government, what liberal editor could fail to be cheerful and optimistic as he watches the progress of that fateful administration so full of promise for all the world? Mr. Snowden's remarkable budget is slipping through the Commons article by article. It is admitted that the Conservative attacks upon it have broken down completely under Mr. Snowden's masterly handling of the situation. The vote of censure moved by the Tories was lost on a division by 317 votes to 252; the result is that the MacDonald Government is more firmly entrenched than at any time since it took office. In January, it will be remembered, our conservative newspapers were prophesying that the Labor Government would not last a month; it would be overthrown by dissensions from within, it would collapse by the withdrawal of Liberal support. Now, if it can win approval for its far-reaching housing proposals, the earliest time set for the fall of the Government is next September, and there are those who think that it will continue to control Great Britain until the next budget, nearly a year hence. More than that, the victory of the liberal forces in France is in reality a triumph for MacDonald. Had he thundered, had he rattled the saber, had he gone at Poincaré hammer and tongs, as some of the Conservatives would have liked him to do, he would have strengthened the hands of Poincaré, and possibly have prevented the welcome outcome of the election by rousing nationalist feeling. Once more a pacifist has shown that the pacifist way is in the highest degree the practical one. He took a great chance, but today the outlook for peace in Europe is far better than it has been at any time since the armistice.

In Germany, too, the situation is much better than could have been expected a little while ago. The rentenmark was ridiculed when it was brought out and declared to be a device that could not delay economic disaster for more than a few weeks. Some of our ablest financial observers thought that its force would be spent by March 15. It has held two months longer and is still holding Germany together, and meanwhile the elections have been as satisfactory as could be expected under the situation. We do not think that the Dawes Report is the ideal solution of the reparations problem, but we do believe that the prospect for some solution has never been so good. We do not believe that Poincaré had the slightest intention of really putting even the Dawes Report into effect. His successors are committed to doing so. With some kind of working agreement arrived at, and with the French troops out of the Ruhr, the chief argument of the German nationalists and militarists will fall to the ground. If Herriot and MacDonald play their cards correctly they can not only go far toward establishing economic sanity in Europe, they can fortify the German Republic as well. And the maintenance of that commonwealth is of the utmost importance to all who believe in that democracy we were supposed to have been fighting for. It is the greatest bulwark in Europe against the rising tide of Fascism.

Even in this country we cannot but believe from innumerable signs that the skies are beginning to clear. True, we still rank with Spain and Italy as one of the most reactionary countries in the world; true, we have just been guilty of a monstrous act of injustice against the Japanese and therefore against the spirit of our American democracy. True it is that we are facing the probable nomination of Calvin Coolidge for that great office for which he is so inadequately equipped. Yet, for all of Wall Street's satisfaction with him, we cannot but feel conscious of a rising ground-swell of protest throughout the country against both the old parties. It means something when a man like Warren Stone, chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, declares that both the old parties are "drowning in oil" and that in his opinion the time has come for a general strike of Labor at the ballot box. The slackening of industry which has been marked in the last six weeks, and will be still more pronounced before the conventions have met and adjourned, is opening the eyes of many people to the meaning of the leaderless, programless drifting which we are experiencing in Washington. The continuing bank failures in the Northwest are more ominous than the Eastern press permits the public to know. They have their political significance. Privately, the Republican politicians in Washington do not hesitate to admit that they are utterly at sea and do not know how to take control again of the ship of state. No honest observer who travels through this country can fail to note the growing public restlessness, the increasing feeling that something is radically wrong in the body politic, or ignore the steadily increasing desire for a new party. If all the necessary leadership is not in sight that will appear before long. It is preposterous to believe that in America alone there is no hope of recovery from the black corruption, the degradation, and the reaction which stamp the World War as the worst investment this country ever made. Our revolution will come as surely as the sun rises, and it is quite possible that it will come as unexpectedly to the wisecracks of the daily press and to the politicians as came the turn-out of Poincaré in France.

Midsummer Madness

IT was in July, 1916, that the Black Tom explosion waked New York from its midnight slumbers and shattered its plate-glass windows. When the insurance agents checked up the losses they discovered that among the cargoes of explosives stored on that tiny bit of Jersey shore were munitions worth $1,500,000 purchased by the Government of His Majesty, the Czar of all the Russias. In the course of time the American courts approved the claims of property-owners who lost by that explosion; in the course of time, also, the Czar of all the Russias was overthrown, and still later the Kerensky regime which followed was superseded by that of the Bolsheviks.

Now, eight years after the explosion, the claim of the "State of Russia" against the Lehigh Valley Railroad seems about to come to trial. Who is the "State of Russia"? One might think that it was the Soviet Government. In the courts of the United States it seems to be Mr. Serge Ughet. And who is Mr. Serge Ughet? He is the successor of Mr. Boris Bakhmeteff as legal representative of that Provisional Government of Russia which our Government so blithely recognized seven months before its fall in 1917, and to which we lent several millions of dollars which were expended, after its fall, in counter-revolutionary endeavors. In the eyes of our august and omniscient State Department Mr. Ughet appears to be the only recognizable Government of Russia, and it is possible that Mr. Ughet may accordingly win the $1,500,000.

Lindley M. Garrison, Secretary of War under Mr. Wilson, wrote to Mr. Hughes as late as February, 1923, asking the following questions:

1. What is the present Government of Russia, and its name?
2. Has such Government been recognized by the United States?
3. What is the extent and nature of such recognition?

To these questions Mr. Hughes replied, with typical legalistic irrelevance, as follows:

I have to inform you that the so-called Provisional Government of Russia, which succeeded to authority upon the abdication of the Czar, was recognized by the Government of the United States on March 22, 1917. On July 5 of the same year Mr. Boris Bakhmeteff was received by the President as the Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the newly recognized Government.

Mr. Bakhmeteff continued to be recognized as the Ambassador of Russia to the United States until June 30, 1922. The custody of the property of the Russian Government in this country, for which Mr. Bakhmeteff had been responsible, was, after the date of his retirement, considered to vest in Mr. Serge Ughet, the financial attaché of the Russian Embassy, whose diplomatic status with this Government was not considered to be altered by the termination of the Ambassador's duties.

In answer specifically to your questions, I may say that the United States has not recognized any other Government in Russia since the fall of the Provisional Government to which reference is made above. The regime now functioning in Russia and known as the Soviet Regime has not been recognized by the United States.

And thus, in 1924, by virtue of the fact that Mr. Hughes still refuses to recognize Soviet Russia Mr. Serge Ughet is, in the eyes of our courts, the "State of Russia" and is suing for $1,500,000. On January 9, 1924, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York reached the following conclusions of law:

1. The plaintiff, the State of Russia, still lives, and is a continuing entity in the contemplation of the law, and is the real party in interest in this action.
2. The plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action.
3. The said Serge Ughet, as financial attaché to the Russian Embassy in the United States, has had continuously since June 30, 1922, and has at the present time the capacity to prosecute on behalf of the plaintiff.

Of course there are further legal points to be settled, and before the courts have unraveled the infinite complications of the law Mr. Hughes may be ex-Secretary Hughes and another Administration may have recognized Russia. But for the present the case stands as an example of the folly of which officialdom is capable.

What a fool is the law, a cynic might say, contemplating the possibility that the courts would hand $1,500,000 to a Russian propagandist nearly seven years after the Government which he represented had bitten the dust. What a fool is the State Department, another cynic might reply, meditating upon the fact that after seven years of stubborn triumph over all odds of foreign invasion and internal disruption the Soviet Government still stands unrecognized, even de facto, by the Government of the United States. And a still more cynical cynic, thinking of the $1,500,000 that belongs of right to the Government recognized as such by the Russian people, but which may, by fiat of Charles E. Hughes, go to Serge Ughet, would say of the State Department, What a knave!

Another Newspaper Tragedy

THE order of the receiver of the Minnesota Daily Star to sell that hopeful development of labor journalism in Minneapolis to the highest bidder marks the end of another promising newspaper experiment.

Our readers will recall an article in the issue of June 6, 1923, entitled A Newspaper with Six Thousand Owners, in which the hope was expressed that the Star might be able to make money and save its soul, since the success of the Star would be of enormous moment to the cause of good journalism everywhere because of its democratic ownership. This hope has been disappointed, at the very moment when the organized industrial and agricultural workers of the Northwest are more than ever in need of a strong daily paper to give expression to the rising revolt on behalf of better political, social, and economic conditions. What is even more discouraging is the fact that this newspaper has failed not because of lack of opportunity, not because the odds against it were insuperable, but because of mistakes in management and dissensions within the staff and among its supporters.

It will be remembered that the Star was a by-product of the Nonpartisan League movement. Naturally, it incurred from the start the opposition of the big-business interests and, therefore, of the big advertisers. In addition, the newspaper field was already occupied by three well-established evening publications of large circulation. But it was enthusiastically financed by the sale of $750,000 worth of stock to farmers and union laborers, and it grew rapidly in circulation and influence. Unfortunately, it was established in far too costly a plant, in an expensive building which was also to have been the headquarters of the Nonpartisan League. It soon became necessary to sell bonds and short-time notes to the extent of another $300,000. Even this did not suffice. Rather than see the paper disappear its managers then compromised by modifying the radical policies of the paper so that it became more of a newspaper and less the crusading organ of an otherwise voiceless class in the community. Its advertising revenue increased in consequence; banks and department stores took note of its existence and found that it paid them to advertise in its columns. It had become safe and sound.

This fatal compromise, however, brought its own punishment with it, for the stockholders rose in revolt and elected a board of directors, a majority of whom were opposed to the editorial policies which the Star had been following. The revolt was highly creditable to the stockholders, who from the first were more interested in having a newspaper that would fight their battles aggressively than in receiving dividends on their stock. But this change came too late. At the first clash, the Star's affairs were thrown into court with the resultant receivership and order for sale. There being no purchaser at the first offering, the paper had perforce to be continued pending its renewed appearance on the auction block.

Discouraging as the failure of the Minnesota Star is, it does not discredit the possibility of the establishment of newspapers owned by groups. The success of the Christian Science Monitor bears directly upon this point. That journal has had able editors and able business managers, and is succeeding. The Minnesota Star would be triumphantly successful today, in our judgment, had it been placed in the hands of experienced journalists and been started on a more modest and inexpensive scale. The mistakes of its managers were largely those of inexperience, but Thomas Van Lear, the president of the Star, a former Socialist mayor of Minneapolis, was not strong enough, or sufficiently rooted in principle, to withstand the temptation to yield at certain points in the hope of establishing the newspaper on a permanent basis. He is not the only newspaper manager who has stooped to succeed in the hope of toning up his paper later and reverting to his ideals. When we in New York have witnessed the spectacle of one of the great business men of the country making a failure of a long-established daily newspaper because he put utterly inexperienced men in charge, it is obviously not fair to say that similar mistakes in the case of the Minnesota Star are peculiar to the labor press. Unfortunately, it is still widely believed in all classes of the community that anybody can run a newspaper, whether he be a politician or a professor, a book-man or a magazine publisher. The lesson of the Minnesota Star is clear: any similar experiment must be begun in a modest and simple way; it must stand or fall on principle. If it cannot succeed save by pandering to the interests it is there to oppose, it ought to suspend before large sums have been invested in it. But before it is started at all, experts should be picked, the necessary funds provided, and the ground surveyed so carefully in advance as to leave no reason for failure, save the refusal of its public to support the enterprise. The public existed in Minneapolis; multitudes wanted a different kind of newspaper, one that was honest and unbought, uncontrolled by the forces that in all our large communities are controlling the press and making for the downfall of American democracy. But the management failed.

The Majesty of the Law

CECILIA COONEY, the twenty-year-old bobbed-haired bandit, has begun a sentence of ten years in prison. And, if she reads the newspapers, she knows that Jules C. Rabiner, middle-aged stockbroker, who conducted a bucket-shop which lost his clients some half million dollars, was, after serving precisely eighty days of his three-year term, released by order of the Parole Commission. If she reads the papers she knows too that President Coolidge pardoned Philip Grossman, a Chicago saloonkeeper who had been sentenced to one year in jail for repeated violations of the law, although while he was supposed to be in jail he had continued selling whiskey without interruption.

The Parole Commission sent an investigator to call upon Mrs. Rabiner, who insisted that her husband was a man of good moral character, but more important was the fact that Mr. Rabiner had political influence. One of Mr. Daugherty's subordinates in the Department of Injustice arranged the record, including letters from United States senators and influential contributors to the Republican Party campaign funds, which induced Mr. Coolidge to crook his presidential fingers and sign Philip Grossman's pardon. Cecilia Cooney's life has already been investigated, but none of the facts in the record are such as induce presidents and politicians to sign pardons or paroles.

Cecilia Cooney was born in a basement; her father was a drunkard and her mother was illiterate. (Both were American-born citizens of North European stock.) At the age of four she slept on a heap of coal at night, and was sent out to beg by day. For four years she was in the care of the Children's Society; then she was returned to her parents, who stole her clothes and deserted her. For a time some of her seven brothers and sisters (her parents did not believe in birth control) sheltered her; but at sixteen her sister turned her out because of objection to her habit of bringing sailors home overnight. Thereupon Cecilia became a laundry-worker, and the testimony of her various employers is that she was a good and cheerful, if noisy, worker. At nineteen she began the career of hold-ups which terminated with the birth of her baby.

The judge gave Cecilia Cooney the maximum sentence. Her comment was: "I expected the limit and I got it. . . . I deserved what I got."

Did she? Cecilia stole. There is no doubt of it, and the law, with majestic equality, forbids rich and poor alike to steal. But Jules C. Rabiner differed from Cecilia chiefly in that he stole more; and Philip Grossman was as defiant of the majestic law. Rabiner and Grossman are back in jail because the newspapers forced reluctant officials to recall the parole and overrule the pardon; but they will never serve ten years in prison. They have influence; Cecilia has not. Ten years hence—seven years if she shows "good behavior"—a tired, thirty-year-old woman will step blinking out of the prison doors, and society will again offer her the protection of its equal laws.

Will Cecilia still bravely say that she deserved what she got? Will it have dawned upon many of us that the Calvin Coolidges, the judges and parole officers, the respectable citizens who call this the greatest country in the world, who resent criticism and want to clap agitators into jail, are more responsible for the fact that girls begin as beggars and conclude as bandits, than the bandits themselves?

The Jewish Babbitt

By BERTHA WALLERSTEIN

ANTI-SEMITISM makes strange bedfellows; such as Charles Hallinan, a thorough American liberal, with all the liberal's generous chivalry for oppressed nationalities—and Abraham Levy.

Abraham Levy is a relative of mine, and I do not know which of us regrets the fact more. "You see," he said to me in triumph when he read Mr. Hallinan's plea in The Nation for January 23 for a better appreciation of Jewish tradition among Jews and their liberal Gentile friends, "you see, even an outsider values the tradition of your race. But you do not. This younger generation!"

Abraham Levy has his troubles with the younger generation, as do the Pharisees of every race. If he agrees with them on any subject, his reasons are very different from theirs. For instance, he admires George Moore's "Brook Kerith." But to him the most perfect English prose of a century is as nothing compared to the fact that George Moore shows up Jesus as a fraud, in Abraham's opinion. Another favorite is Ludwig Lewisohn's "Upstream." "Here," says Abraham, "is a fine fellow, a 'modern,' but a fine fellow, who carries on the proud traditions of his race and suffers for it." Lewisohn's eloquent picture of the lonely man facing the mob with his back to the wall is to Abraham Levy merely a defense of his own mob loyalty, which happens to be Jewish instead of American.

Shakespeare wrote "The Merchant of Venice," according to Abraham, merely to work in the speech beginning: "Hath not a Jew eyes?" Galsworthy wrote "Loyalties" only to prove the glory of the Jewish loyalty as opposed to the cheapness of all the other loyalties in the play. When De Levis, after breaking his neck to get into aristocratic English society, found himself defeated, and took refuge in "I'm a Jew and I am proud of it!" Abraham Levy applauded. The point of the whole play was De Levis's pride in his race!

Abraham believes in revising the immigration laws so as to admit Jews. He is opposed to restriction because his motto is "Jews first!" precisely as your American jingo favors restriction because his motto is "America first!" Mere human rights are beside the point for the jingo Jew, as they are for the jingo American, or the jingo Briton, or the jingo Frenchman, or for any other jingo. Abraham is as thorough a jingo as any of them. Right or wrong, my race! He lives on as narrow a Main Street as Sam Clark. He is as rampantly Semitic as the Ku Klux Klan is Nordic. He is indeed a Grand Kleagle of the unofficial Jew Klux Klan.

To be sure, the Jew Klux Klan proceeds neither in secret nor with violence. Perhaps that is because it is not strong enough. Perhaps it is because it has thirty centuries of civilization behind it, to the Nordic's four. But thirty centuries are all too little to learn to appreciate the man who is different from you. The Jew Klux Klan does not wish to exterminate the Nordics, nor to drive them from America. To that extent it is more civilized than its Nordic prototype. But it guards its Jewish borders jealously from any invasion of foreign blood. It excommunicates those of its sons who marry "outsiders." It frowns on those who associate with Gentiles. It employs, so far as possible, only Jews. It protests when Jews deal at Gentile stores. (To be sure, this is almost impossible in New York.) It laments the fact that its sons and daughters are "growing away from Judaism."

"He is a real Jew"—that is the highest praise that Abraham and his friends can give, precisely as Babbitt's highest praise is: "He is a 100 per cent American."

Among themselves intelligent Jews recognize the existence of the Jew Klux Klan. But they are unwilling to acknowledge it to their Gentile friends. Half of them react against it with considerable irritation, and ignore its existence, as they ignore the existence of the Jewish race. The other half are silent about it, outside Jewish circles at least, believing that they owe a loyal silence to their race. They refuse to wash soiled Jewish linen in public. In this they share the "inferiority complex" of all oppressed nationalities. Your intelligent Briton, your intelligent American, your intelligent Frenchman is willing enough to criticize his own nation, even in the hearing of foreigners. But your intelligent Jew is silent. He is inclined to leave the criticism of his race to the unintelligent, uncomprehending Gentile; in short, to the Babbitts. The Prophets were a conspicuous exception. If he is American, the Jew is quite willing to wash soiled American linen in public. If he is British, he is ready to criticize the British stand-patters. But as a rule he blandly continues the pretense that there is no soiled Jewish linen, no Jewish stand-patterdom, no Jewish Pharisism.

And in this Gentile liberals support him. Such criticism has been almost entirely absent from the series of discussions of the Jewish question appearing in The Nation over the names of Jews and Gentiles. The instinctive sympathy of the liberal for oppressed nationalities blinds him to their failings. He actually champions jingoism in the little nation while he deplores it in his own. In his zeal to see the other side, he stands up so straight that he bends backwards. In his breadth of mind he encourages narrowness in others. It is then that we have the paradox of Abraham Levy applauding Charles Hallinan.

Ten years ago this was a natural state of affairs. Czechs were then chafing under the Austrian yoke. Polish school-children were forbidden to use their own language. Only three years ago the Black and Tans were butchering and burning in Ireland. All liberal-minded people cried out in horror. They championed the Irishman, the Czech, the Pole, precisely as they champion the Jew today. They did not stop at demanding mere security of life and property for Irishman, Pole, and Czech. They demanded for them freedom for "national expression." They believed that the world was losing something precious in crushing the rich personalities of Ireland, Poland, and Bohemia.

American liberals were especially staunch in their defense of national minorities, because they were so close at hand. Madison Square Garden in those days housed demonstration after demonstration for Irish freedom, for Polish freedom, for Czech freedom. In smoky little New York restaurants patriots met and plotted liberating coups d'état to take place in Warsaw, Dublin, Budapest, and Prague. And American liberals looked on and said: "Godspeed, brother!" Ten years ago the liberal was the knight errant, and every oppressed nationality was a beautiful maiden locked in the giant's dungeon. Ten years ago the issue was clear cut between giant strength and helpless virtue. The liberal might be forgiven his romantic view.

But today he ought to be wiser. A government elected by Irishmen jails Sinn Feiners. German school-children within Czecho-Slovakian boundaries are forced to speak an alien tongue. The Polish people pay taxes to support Polish militarism instead of Russian militarism. Free nationalism has given place to Fascism. Like Cleopatra in Shaw's play, the moment the small nation wins her queenly right to power, she snatches a whip and cries: "I want to beat somebody!"

Self-determination is realized, for some nations at least, and what is the result? The little fellow now shares with the big one the right to do wrong!

Perhaps that is not the least sacred of human rights. Surely the moral of our disillusionment is not that Ireland should be returned to Britain, Bohemia to Austria, Poland to Russia, Germany, and Austria. It is well that each should be responsible for her own salvation, and unable, if she fails to achieve it, to put the blame on the oppressor. But there is a moral here for the liberal. He has freed the beautiful shackled maiden and she turns out to be a churlish shrew. If she was beautiful ten years ago, she owed her beauty to the dim light of the dungeon. It is a poor beauty which cannot stand the strong light of freedom and responsibility.

The last ten years have cured the liberal of romancing about Poland and Ireland and the others. They ought to have cured him of romancing about all oppressed nationalities, including the Jews. Not of defending, but of romancing. Can you not demand mere human rights for the Jew, free access to universities, to employment, the right to hold office, to live where he pleases, to stop at any hotels he may choose, and, above all, security of life and property—can you not demand these simple things just because Jews are human beings without making a romance of the whole race? Can you not face the fact that Jews consist, for the most part, of Abraham Levys, and still find their rights as human beings worth fighting for? There is nothing pitiful, nothing romantic, nothing heroic about the Jew, as you will discover if you ever manage to strip him of his martyrdom, as you have stripped Poland and Ireland. It takes more than a dungeon to make a hero, just as it takes more than a garret to make an artist.

If liberals will face this fact about Jews they will do more than save themselves a rude shock, such as they suffered when they saw the principle of self-determination in action. They will help the Jew to recover from his "martyr complex," which really makes him a rather unpleasant person. His liberal friends have encouraged it, for the martyred Jew satisfies their craving for romance. So the Jew goes around the world, meeting rebuffs, as do most non-Jews as well, and saying to himself: "They snub me because I am a Jew." Rebuffs do not develop in him that doubt of his individual eligibility which serves to quell the unpleasant ego lurking in the best of men. He sees every rebuff as aimed at his Jewishness, never at his own private personality. In emphasizing the Jew's consciousness of persecution, the liberal friend who holds his hand with a bedside manner is as much his enemy as the man who spits upon his Jewish gaberdine.

But, above all, the well-meant bedside manner of the liberal throws an unhealthy aura of heroism around the Jew. It is easy to be a hero in chains. The real test of the hero is to rise above prosperity. The Pole and the Irishman have failed the liberal there. And if we face the facts, we see that the Jew has done the same. The European Jew who fled from pogrom fires with his family, and found his way to a New York sweatshop, to rise to be a great clothing manufacturer, or perhaps a labor leader, is undeniably a romantic figure. His son goes to college and flourishes sporty ties and cheers the loudest on the football field. The clothing manufacturer's son no doubt drives his own car, and lives in a frat house, probably a Jewish frat house, but modeled exactly on the lines of the most exclusive frat house on the campus. The Jew can boast an heroic ancestry, as can nearly every American, for every boat from the Mayflower to the Olympic, which docked last week, has carried its carload of romance, of pioneers seeking their fortunes in a new land. The Cabots and the Hancocks are removed by ten generations from the same pioneer story which you can read in the Russian Jewish faces on Ellis Island today. But the second and third generations have lost the heroism with the hardships. They have not been big enough to rise above prosperity. They have settled comfortably into the smug upholstery of Jew Klux Klannery, just a little smuggler because they are championed by American liberals. To be sure, there is the Jewish liberal. He is more interested in the liberation of the Irishman, the Mexican, or the Negro than in the liberation of the Jew. In that he is like all liberals. He is a little resentful when Gentile liberals innocently assume that he is a staunch Jewish patriot. His resentment runs as true to liberal form as the Gentile's assumption. (Moreover, he knows the Jew Klux Klan, and the Gentile does not.) He is still more resentful when the Jew Klux Klan accuse him of being a traitor to his race. Not long ago two rabbis attacked a Jewish publisher for bringing out an excellent book, which they considered anti-Semitic. The publisher, who has done as much as any man to give good literature to the American public, and probably more than any other man to defend the freedom of American book publishing, replied that he published the book because it was good literature, regardless of its bearing on Jews and Judaism. Like all good liberals, he put loyalty to truth before loyalty to race or nation. He spoke for Jewish liberalism as he had already spoken for American liberalism.

The Jewish liberal holds precisely the same position in regard to the Jew Klux Klan that the American liberal holds in regard to the Ku Klux Klan. Yet he has been timid about declaring himself, naturally, perhaps, because he does not want to hit his own people when they are down. It is the Ku Kluxers in America, and the Fascisti all over Europe, who made the liberal Jew waver. It is the Ku Kluxers and the Fascisti who drive the liberal Gentile, without his knowing it, into the arms of the Jew Klux Klan. The issues are confused, but it is time that they were straightened out. It is time that liberals, Jew and Gentile alike, faced the reality that most Jews are Abraham Levys, just as most Americans are Babbitts, remembering all the while that the Declaration of Independence applies even to Abraham.

New Morals for Old

Can Men and Women Be Friends?

By FLOYD DELL

FRIENDSHIP between men and women is rather a new thing in the history of the world. Friendship depends upon equality and choice, and there has been very little of either in the relations of the sexes, up to the present. A woman does not choose her male relatives, nor is she according to archaic family laws their equal; motives other than personal choice might lead her to become a man's wife; wholly impersonal reasons might place her in the relationship of kept mistress. Only in her role of paramour was there any implication of free choice; and even here there was no full equality, not even of danger. None of these customary relationships of the past can be said to have fostered friendship between men and women. Doubtless it did exist, but under difficulties.

Family bonds, however, are being more and more relaxed, women are no longer the wards of their male relatives, and friendship with a father or brother is more than ever possible. Further, the free personal choice which marked only the romantic amours of the age of chivalry is now popularly regarded in America as essential to any decent marriage, while the possibility of divorce tends to make free choice something besides a mere youthful illusion. More than ever before, husbands and wives are friends.

At the same time the intensity of friendships between people of the same sex appears to be diminishing. This intensity, in its classic instances, as in Greece, we now regard as an artificial product, the result of the segregation of the sexes and the low social position of women. As women become free and equal with men such romantic intensity of emotion finds a more biologically appropriate expression. Friendships between people of the same sex must today compete on the one hand with romantic love and on the other with the more fascinating though often less enduring friendships which can now be enjoyed between men and women. Neglect of these latter opportunities is coming to be regarded as a kind of spiritual cowardice, or at least as a failure in enterprise.

The influences of the machine age, so destructive to fixed authoritarian relationships, appear to foster the growth of friendship between the sexes; so much so that we may expect it to become, in its further developments, a characteristic social feature of the age that lies immediately before us.

Friendship will become a more and more important aspect of marriage itself; but, except in the effects of its wider spread, this will hardly be a new thing—we have friendships between husbands and wives now. Nor will extra-marital friendships between men and women be precisely a new thing. What will be new, furnishing us with an interesting theme for sociological speculation, are the conventions which will gradually come into existence to give social protection and dignity to extra-marital friendships.

Conventions are, doubtless, always rather ridiculous, inevitably a shackle upon the free motions of the soul, being imposed by fear. But it will be remembered that we, in America, with a vast amount of freedom of intersexual association, have thus far only begun to dispense with the locks and bars and whippings and chaperons which were the appurtenances of a physical segregation of the sexes; the vast paraphernalia of psychic segregation, including sexual taboos which hark back to the primeval darkness, are with us still. Our minds are habituated to unreasonable fears in all matters concerning the relations of the sexes. For a long time, extra-marital friendships of men and women may be expected to be hedged about with elaborate and specific permissions, for the sake of keeping them under social control. Yet these conventions may be very convenient; and however irksome they may seem to the free spirits of a future day, they may still be such as would appear to us generously libertarian.

Today, in the absence of such conventions, it does not suffice that a man and woman, too well married to be afraid of extra-marital friendships, grant them to each other by private treaty; relatives, friends, and neighbors do not fail to be duly alarmed. Extra-marital friendship exists in an atmosphere of social suspicion which a few conventions would go far to alleviate.

As an example in a different field, the convention with regard to dancing may be adduced. If dancing were not a general custom, if it were the enlightened practice of an advanced few, how peculiar and suspicious would seem the desire of Mr. X and Mrs. Y to embrace each other to music; and how scandalized the neighbors would be to hear that they did! No one would rest until the pair had been driven into an elopement.

We build huge palaces for the kind of happy communion which dancing furnishes; we tend more and more to behave like civilized beings about the impulses which are thus given scope. We are less socially hospitable to the impulses of friendship between men and women.

In friendship there are many moods; but the universal rite of friendship is talk. Talk needs no palaces for its encouragement; it is not an expensive affair; it would seem to be well within the reach of all. Yet it isn't. For the talk of friendship requires privacy—though the privacy of a table for two in a crowded and noisy restaurant will suffice; and it requires time. Such talk does not readily adjust itself to the limitations of the dinner hour. It is a flower slow in unfolding; and it seems to come to its most perfect bloom only after midnight. But, unfortunately, not every restaurant keeps open all night. It is satisfied with two comfortable chairs; a table to lean elbows on is good, too; in winter an open fire, where friendly eyes may stare dreamily into the glowing coals—that is very good; hot or cold drinks according to the season, and a cigarette—these are almost the height of friendship's luxury. These seem not too much to ask. Yet the desire for privacy and uncounted hours of time together is, when considered from that point of view, scandalous in its implications; quite as much so as the desire of Mr. X and Mrs. Y to embrace each other to music. However, Mr. X and Mrs. Y do, under the aegis of a convention, indulge their desire and embrace each other to their heart's content with the full approval of civilized society; and it seems as though another convention might grow up, under the protection of which Mr. X and Mrs. Y might sit up and talk all night without its seeming queer of them.

In The Nation's series on New Morals for Old have already appeared articles by Bertrand Russell and Elsie Clews Parsons. The next article, to appear in the issue of June 11, will be Toward Monogamy, by Charlotte Perkins Gilman.

Queer, at the least, it does seem nowadays, except under the conventions of courtship; friends who happen to be married to each other can of course talk comfortably in bed. These bare facts are sufficient to explain why so many men and women who really want to be friends and sit up all night occasionally and talk find it easy to believe that they are in love with each other. They find it all the easier to believe this, because friendship between the sexes is usually spiced with some degree of sexual attraction. But a degree of sexual attraction which might have kept a friendship forever sweet may prove unequal to the requirements of a more serious and intimate relationship. Disillusionment is the penalty, at the very least. Society could well afford to grant more freedom to friendship between men and women, and save the expense of a large number of broken hearts.

It is worth while to wonder if a good deal of "romance" is not, after all, friendship mistaking itself for something else; or rather, finding its only opportunity for expression in that mistake. Among civilized people, after the romance has ended, the friendship remains. It may perhaps have been worth while to imagine oneself in love, in order to enjoy a friendship; but it seems rather a wasteful proceeding.

Yet those who, taking a merely economical view of the situation, attempt to enjoy such friendships without becoming involved or involving others in such waste, may with some embarrassment discover—what Mrs. Grundy could have told them all along—that friendship and sexual romance may sometimes be difficult to relegate to previously determined boundaries. Friendship between the sexes may, if only for a moment, seem to demand the same tokens of sincerity as romantic love. Does not this fact threaten the traditional, jealousy-guarded dignity of marriage?

Perhaps it does. At present, in any conflict of claims between a marriage and a friendship, there is "nothing to arbitrate"; marriage has all the rights, friendship none. If the rights of friendship are to be at all considered and protected, marriage may have to yield something. It may not be good manners for husbands and wives to be jealous of the quite possible momentary exuberances of each other's friendships; it may be that such incidents will be regarded as being within the discretion of the persons immediately concerned, and not quite proper subjects for inquiry, speculation, or comment by anybody else.

And this might have an effect unsuspected by those whom such a prospect of liberty would most alarm today. When a moment's rashness does not necessarily imply red ruin and the breaking up of homes, when sex is freed to a degree from the sense of overwhelming social consequences, it may well become a matter of more profound personal consequence; and with nothing to fear except the spoiling of their friendship, men and women in an ardent friendship may yet prefer talk to kisses.

"But what if they don't?" A complete answer to that question, from the Utopian point of view, would take us far afield from the subject of friendship; yet some further answer may seem to be required, if only by way of confessing to Mrs. Grundy that the problem is not so simple as it may seem. Well, then, out of many possibilities which the future holds, I offer this one for what it may be worth. Such friendships, let us agree, tend to merge insensibly into romantic sexual love. But if marriage may be conceived as yielding some of its traditional rights, extra-marital romance may well be called upon for similar concessions. The first thing that extra-marital romance might be asked to surrender would be its intolerable and fatuous airs of holiness. Yes, "holiness" is the word—a holiness all the more asserted by such extra-marital lovers because their relations are likely to be taken disrespectfully by a stupid world. Oh, unquestionably, if you ask them, never was any legal and conventional love so high and holy as this romantic passion of theirs! Its transcendental holiness calls for sacrifices. So they sacrifice themselves—and, incidentally, others—to it. Anything less, they feel, would be cowardly. They must not palter with these sacred emotions—not even by the exercise of their dormant sense of humor!—So it is today: but perhaps in a future where extra-marital romance is made room for with a tender and humorous courtesy, it may give up these preposterous and solemn airs, and actually learn to smile at its illusions—illusions which will still give the zest of ultimate danger to relationships of merely happy and light-hearted play. Thus life will continue to be interesting.

As for the talk of friendship, my Utopian speculations uncover for me no respect in which the thing itself can be improved upon. The circumstances can be made happier, the attitude of society can foster it; but the talk of friendship has already reached a splendid perfection beyond which my imagination is unable to soar. At its best it has, despite its personal aspect, an impersonal beauty; it is a poignant fulfilment of those profound impulses which we call curiosity and candor; it serves human needs as deep as those which poetry and music serve, and is in some sense an art like them. The art exists, and it remains only for the future to give it an adequate hospitality.

Islands

By LAURA BENÉT

Let islands be never discovered,
 Leave them to loneliness
 And loneliness again, unutterable:
 Enchanted wreckage of chaos
 Born of mystery burdened foam.
 Seek the far water
 When in sight of the tree tops,
 But never discover, O sailors!
 The secret of beauty the sea hides
 Is drowned in the finding.

Glass Walls

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THERE is much to be said for the proposal that all hotels should be ordered to have glass walls and glass partitions. They should also be ordered to be brilliantly illuminated throughout at all times.

Many evils happen in hotels. Poker games happen in hotels. So do conferences for dictating presidential nominations. Such evils—and numerous others which will readily occur to the reader—would be checked by the reform here indicated. Therefore this reform should be adopted.

Any reform which checks an evil should be adopted and enacted. The great aid to all evils is privacy. It has been said that God sees everything. If people only believed it they would be good. Now they are bad. Since therefore they do not believe that God is seeing them, it becomes necessary that their neighbors should see them—at all times.

Much progress recently has been made in this direction. People now are much more careful in their telegrams. They know now that almost any United States Senator on almost any senatorial committee is likely at any time to send to the telegraph companies for their telegrams. They know that their telegrams may at any time be read to the whole United States Senate. They therefore send better and fewer telegrams.

It will soon be provided that when any citizen writes a letter he shall file a carbon or duplicate of it at his local post office and that any neighbor may at any time read it. This reform will enormously and beneficently decrease the volume of the kind of correspondence that gets read in courtrooms in divorce cases. When men and women once realize that all their indiscreet amorous missives will be read by all the neighbors, they will not write them.

Thus an undoubted evil will be checked. The reform here proposed therefore must be, and will be, adopted.

Already the Senate has decreed that every citizen's income-tax return shall be open to be read by every other citizen. This reform is necessitated because some citizens dodge their taxes. In order to prevent some citizens from dodging their taxes, the private financial affairs of all other citizens must become public property. Good citizens may feel outraged, but bad citizens will be frustrated. Anything that frustrates any badness by any citizen is right. Therefore this reform is right.

Additionally it accomplishes a further diminishment of privacy and a further advancement of publicity in all things. The more publicity we have, the more perfectly we shall always do what the mass of our neighbors think we ought to do. This is undeniable. Therefore the case for the total abolishing of privacy is proved.

The State of Nebraska has abolished private judgment regarding the teaching of languages to children. It has decided that no father shall cause his child to learn a foreign language in a grade school. He may wish the child to learn it. The child may wish to learn it. The neighbors, however, as represented by the politicians in the legislature of Nebraska, have decided that the father shall not cause the child to learn it.

Theologians, after long study, once told us everything. Now the neighbors, after no study at all, tell us everything. Thus we move forward.

The theologians worked within limits. They thought there were some things which could not be ordered. St. Thomas Aquinas, greatest of the theologians, said that any law which goes counter to the natural rights given by God to man is no law but only "a species of force," deserving of no respect or obedience.

Thomas Jefferson, the freethinker, agreed with St. Thomas Aquinas. He was perhaps not so sure about God but he was perfectly sure about natural rights. He was willing to defend natural rights against majorities as well as against kings.

St. Thomas Aquinas, God, natural rights, and Thomas Jefferson lived a long time ago. They represented theories. Now we have "conservatives" and "progressives." They represent a struggle over facts.

The conservatives wish to maintain existing institutions. If they can pass laws impeding free speech against existing institutions, they love to do it. They ask: "Shall a man, by a right of free speech, interrupt the general welfare?" They crushingly answer: "No."

The progressives are different. They wish to modify existing institutions. They pass laws providing, for instance, that if the Post Office Department thinks I am using the mails to defraud the public, which must be protected, why, then, the Post Office Department can shut me out of the mails and destroy my business without judge or jury.

If I complain that my property has been taken from me without any genuine due process of law, the progressives ask: "What? Shall a man, by a right of property, interrupt progress and righteousness and the general welfare?" Crushingly they answer: "No."

Both progressives and conservatives are for the general welfare. They differ as to what the general welfare is. Equally, however, they are for it. The difference between them is that the conservatives will trample on human rights to get to the general welfare and the progressives will trample on the property rights of human beings to get to the general welfare.

It makes everything very simple. It makes it so much simpler than in the old days of human rights and property rights. Then you started with rights and sailed away and nobody could tell where you would arrive. That was not scientific. It led to adventures. It produced mishaps. It produced evils. Now everything is clear. Now all we have to do is to decide what the general welfare is and go there.

The general welfare is a fact. It can be decided. When the conservatives are in the majority, the general welfare is conservative. When the progressives are in the majority, the general welfare is progressive. Thus all doubt disappears. This is an age not of theories based on religion, but of certainties based on science.

Science is interpreted into the general welfare by legislatures. Legislatures are inspired by the neighbors back home. They know the thing that is my welfare today and they know the different thing that is my welfare tomorrow. They are not trammelled by any theories of natural rights and their decisions are enforced by the police forces. All that stands in the way of a complete triumph of the general welfare is occasionally the courts.

Mr. Arthur F. Mullen of Omaha came down to Washington and argued against the Nebraska foreign-language grade-school law before the United States Supreme Court. He seemed to hold that if any one father in all Nebraska wanted his child to learn a foreign language, he had a natural and constitutional right to have him learn it if he could find a school to teach it to him.

The Supreme Court agreed with Mr. Mullen. It overthrew the will of the people of Nebraska and made it again possible for any one father in Nebraska to defy all the other fathers in Nebraska in the matter of the foreign languages to be known and spoken in his household. Oh, the shame of it.

Moreover, unless we arouse ourselves, the will of the people of Oregon and the general welfare of the State of Oregon will be similarly overthrown. In Oregon most fathers want to send their children to schools managed by politicians. So they have decided by law that no father in Oregon may send his child to any school managed by clergymen. They have decided by law that the privacy of private schools must go.

This law is likely to be voided and annulled by nine old men in Washington. The nine old men must be intimidated out of their wits and intentions. Mass meetings must be held. Letters must be written. If, as usual the nine old men refuse to be intimidated and do not even know that they are being intimidated then at last the only effective course in the circumstances must be taken.

A commission of young men, thoroughly versed in the materialistic conception of history, must be employed to go through the federal Constitution and strike out of it all allusions to all alleged natural rights.

Looking at the list of natural rights in the federal Constitution, and then looking at the contemporary majority, who could fail to abandon the list and trust to the majority?

The Constitution buttresses private judgment and privacy and a certain freedom to go wrong. The majority is for public judgment and publicity and a compulsion to go right. Therefore the majority is right.

Fortunately, in any case, the majority is gradually penetrating the Constitution with its scientific moralizing influence.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, depending upon the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution and upon the Volstead law, has decided that fruit juices must not be kept in the home after they have become intoxicating.

At that point of development somebody must eject those fruit juices from the home. Naturally the householder cannot be expected to do it. He will not deprive himself of the fruition of his fruits. Somebody else must do it. An inquirer, an investigator, an inspector must do it.

Commenting triumphantly on such an inspection, a Western judge remarked the other day that no longer was there any merit in the ancient legal maxim that a man's house is his castle. Such a maxim may have fitted the British subjects of a Tudor monarch four hundred years ago. It does not fit the citizens of this republic now. Their houses, their cellars, their pantries, their bottles must be open on suspicion to any public official who may wish to examine them.

Other countries may try to socialize the economic means of production and distribution. That is wrong. That is radicalism. For us there has been reserved the nobler task of socializing our citizens' homes and private lives.

We will read their telegrams and their letters. We will pore over their income-tax returns. We will choose their children's schools. We will choose their children's studies. We will eliminate objectionable passages from their motion pictures and from their books. We will prevent them from gambling on horse races. We will prevent them from going to horse races. We will prevent them from going to prize-fights and also from looking at photographic reproductions of prize-fights. Either by laws or by mobs we will also choose their religions for them. The reason is clear. This country existed once to promote rights. Now it exists to prevent evils.

Rights interfere with checking evils. That is admitted. Therefore rights must go. That is happening. Privacy, the worst of all rights, and the root in fact of the maintenance of all rights, should now be taught a final lesson.

It has one great remaining citadel. That citadel is the hotel. Men leave their homes, where they are watched by their wives and by prohibition inspectors and by school inspectors and by the Ku Klux Klan, and they go to hotel rooms and play card games. They also, in hotel rooms, hold secret conferences (in which there are no representatives of the public) while they decide which candidate they will support for President or for sheriff. They also, in hotel rooms, are guilty of numerous other shameful scandals.

Large numbers of homes have been disrupted because of things which have happened in hotels. If all the walls and all the partitions of all hotels had been made of glass, these things would not have happened. Particularly would they not have happened if all rooms in all hotels, besides having glass walls and partitions, had been at all times brilliantly illuminated.

Therefore it is proved that all hotels should have glass walls and partitions and should be at all times brilliantly illuminated. Congress will provide that the glass shall not be wired glass but perfectly clear glass. To every hotel there will be assigned a municipal inspector, a county inspector, a State inspector, a federal inspector, and a League of Nations inspector. These inspectors will sit on the opposite side of the street in rocking-chairs and will look the hotel through at all times. All night long in all the thousands of hotels throughout this country the eyes of the public, through the walls here specified and under the lights here provided and by means of the inspectors here required, will be upon all wayfarers in interstate commerce.

These wayfarers are the only Americans not yet cornered and caught. This reform will catch them. They, too, will have to surrender to publicity and to morality; and as each of them sinks to sleep on his own little cot in his own little room, all by himself, he shall raise his right hand in salute to the inspectors on the other side of the street and he further by law shall recite the following meditation, which will be furnished on cards by the new Federal Department of Social Welfare:

"Fellow-citizens, who am I? I am a worm. You are one hundred and ten million worms. Your will, not mine, be done."

Fascist Terrorism in the Tyrol

By ROBERT DELL

(This is the concluding article of a series on the situation in South Tyrol. The first was South Tyrol—Austria's Lost Province, and the second Fascist Rule in South Tyrol.)

Bozen, April 5

THE Fascist laws under which South Tyrol is now suffering have all been enacted during the last twelve months by decrees of the prefect of the Province of Trent. This again is a flagrant violation of the assurance that the inhabitants of South Tyrol should be treated on an equality with other Italian citizens. In no other Italian province has the prefect such powers. Even local government has been to a great extent suppressed in South Tyrol. The municipal councils of Bozen, Meran, and the other towns of any size have been dissolved and their powers transferred to an Italian town commissioner, who as a rule cannot speak or understand a word of German. That is the case of the town commissioner of Bozen, who is, however, personally a very reasonable man and is lenient in his administration. The sub-prefect of Bozen and the questor, who has to do with the registration of foreigners, are also entirely ignorant of German. The sub-prefect speaks only Italian and a little bad French. He is an extreme Fascist and is personally unpopular, but the Italian officers and soldiers quartered in Bozen, who are not numerous, are much liked by the population, which agrees that they behave extremely well. I met the colonel commanding the carabinieri, who is a charming man and interferes with the people as little as possible. Even the sub-prefect, so far as I could learn, shows no unnecessary harshness in administering the decrees that he has to administer, but he has organized an elaborate system of espionage—no doubt acting under instructions—and inhabitants that have not been given Italian nationality live under the constant menace of expulsion at a moment's notice. As always happens in an arbitrary regime, denunciations are sometimes made out of personal spite. In one case a business man who had lived all his life in Bozen and had never taken any part in politics was denounced by an Italian who was jealous of him on account of a lady and was saved from expulsion only because he happened to know a prominent Fascist who intervened on his behalf. German inhabitants taking an active part in politics, particularly the members of the Deutsche Verband, are under continual police supervision, are tracked wherever they go, and dare not intrust to the post any letter dealing with political matters because all their letters are secretly opened. I had two conversations with the sub-prefect—not without some difficulty, as I do not speak Italian. I put to him the various facts that I had learned and he did not contest the accuracy of any of them. He merely asserted that most of the inhabitants of South Tyrol could speak Italian and were perfectly contented under Italian rule, and that the province had complete liberty. He seemed very much afraid of English and American public opinion and warned me—perhaps only half in earnest—that if I wrote anything disagreeable to the Italian Government he would have me turned back at the frontier if I again visited South Tyrol. I am taking the risk.

Fascism is a German product. Its real inventor was Herr Escherich, the "man" of Prince Rupert of Bavaria, who spent some time in Italy and gave Duke Mussolini all his ideas. The German Fascisti are much disconcerted by the conduct of their Italian brethren in South Tyrol and are torn between their German nationalist and their Fascist sympathies. They are in the habit of making excuses for Mussolini on the supposition that he does not know what is going on in South Tyrol and that the local Italian authorities are responsible for the treatment of the German Tyrolese. This theory cannot be reconciled with the facts. As I have said, the local authorities in South Tyrol are on the whole reasonable and moderate. Some of them, perhaps—for they are not all Fascisti—do not entirely approve of the policy that they are bound to carry out. In one case at least—that of the decree relating to the employment of foreigners in hotels—they have not insisted on a strict enforcement of the law, but they are only agents who have to obey instructions and administer the law, be it good or bad. They have no personal responsibility for the oppressive treatment of the German inhabitants, which is entirely due to the decrees of the prefect of Trent. The prefect acts under the instructions of the Italian Government.

Moreover, one of the worst decrees—that of October 1, 1923, relating to instruction in the elementary schools—is a royal decree applying to the whole of Italy and promulgated by the central Government, that is, by Mussolini himself. This decree makes Italian the sole language of instruction in all elementary schools throughout the kingdom, but the introduction of Italian in parishes where another tongue is usually spoken is to be gradual. This year the instruction is in Italian only in the first classes for the youngest children. Next year the use of Italian will be extended to the second classes, and so on annually until "in a number of years corresponding to that of the school classes Italian will be the language of instruction in all elementary and parish schools." The native language is to be taught in extra lessons out of the ordinary school hours and instruction in it will be obligatory for those children whose parents desire it. This means that the policy that has been so successful in Italian Savoy is now reversed and the French-speaking inhabitants of that province will no longer enjoy the right of having schools in their own language. French is, if possible, to be stamped out in Savoy like German in South Tyrol. The stupidity of this change is incredible. The French-speaking population of Savoy, which has hitherto been loyal and contented, will inevitably become discontented and hostile. In South Tyrol the decree must involve the dismissal of a large number of elementary teachers, the great majority of whom cannot speak Italian, and the appointment of Italian teachers in their place—that is probably one of its objects. There can be little doubt that the Italian Government intends sooner or later to deal in the same way with secondary and higher education. Already an attack is being made on the German secondary schools in South Tyrol, two of which, one for boys and the other for girls, have been suppressed in Bozen. On November 23 the Government promulgated another decree ordering that in all those elementary classes that are taught in Italian, religious teaching must be given in the same language. This is an even heavier blow to the national and religious sentiment of the German Tyrolese, who are devout Catholics.

There are many other evidences of the design to stamp out the German language and culture in South Tyrol. Naturally there is no political liberty in the province, for there is none in Italy, but in South Tyrol the interference with freedom of speech is not restricted to political matters. Lectures on the works of Tyrolese poets and philosophers, such as Lutterotti and Peter Anich, have been prohibited and societies for the study of German language and literature suppressed. The prefect of Trent has ordered the removal from the schools of all pictures of the Tyrolese national heroes, Andreas Hofer, Haspinger, and Speckbacher—a particularly odious affront to popular sentiment. A parallel to it would be the compulsory removal of portraits of George Washington from the schools of an American State. Last September the prefect of Trent dissolved all Alpine clubs, unions, or sections not affiliated to the Italian Alpine Club and transferred their property to the latter, although the continued existence of the German Alpine clubs had been sanctioned by the Italian Government in a decree dated April 9, 1921. Senator Tolomei demanded the removal from the Walterplatz in Bozen of the statue of Walter von der Vogelweide, but this has not yet been done and it may be hoped that the Italian Government will refrain from so contemptible an outrage.

It is not the only breach of faith of which Mussolini and his servants have been guilty. They have now suddenly begun to confiscate the property of German citizens in South Tyrol—five years after the armistice! This confiscation is not authorized by Article 249 (a) of the Treaty of St. Germain, which refers only to the property of Austrian citizens, nor is it authorized by Article 297 (b) of the Treaty of Versailles, which refers to the property of "German nationals or companies controlled by them" within the territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates of the Allied and Associated Powers, "including territories ceded to them by the present treaty." South Tyrol was ceded to Italy, not by the Treaty of Versailles but by the Treaty of St. Germain. The Italian Government asserts that the Reparation Commission in November, 1919, authorized the confiscation of German property in South Tyrol on the ground that such action was in accordance with the "spirit" of the peace treaties. If so, the Reparation Commission would have exceeded its powers. It has no sort of right to authorize a departure from the letter of the treaties. But in fact the decision was that of a subcommittee of the Reparation Commission, not of the commission itself, and, since it was not unanimous, it was of no effect, unanimity being required by the Treaty of Versailles for all interpretations of the provisions of the treaty concerning reparations. The present action of the Italian Government is, therefore, a violation of the peace treaties.

It is also, as has been said, a breach of faith. German owners of property in South Tyrol were at liberty to sell their real estate from the day of the armistice, November 11, 1918, until February 13, 1919, when they were prohibited by the Italian Government from selling it, and again from October 8, 1919, when the prohibition was withdrawn, until December 18, 1919, when it was again issued. Very few took advantage of these opportunities because they relied on the provisions of the peace treaties, but still more because the Italian Government unofficially declared that it had no intention of confiscating their property. The case of German personal property is still worse. Its owners could have sold or removed it at any time up to December 22, 1921, when it was sequestrated by a decree of the Italian Government. They did not use this right because the Italian Government had given an official assurance that the personal property of German citizens in the new province should in no case be confiscated. In these circumstances the present proceedings are an infamy. A large number of the Germans concerned have taken legal action to contest the right of the Italian Government to confiscate their property. The action has not yet been decided, yet the Italian Government is proceeding with the confiscations, although common decency demands that it should suspend them pending the judgment. This is obviously a matter for the German Government, which should demand the reference of the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice. But the present German Government, being anxious to curry favor with Mussolini and the Italian Fascisti, is doing nothing and the Germans in South Tyrol bitterly complain of the way in which they are being deserted by those whose duty it is to defend them.

The full iniquity of the conduct of the Italian Government in this matter will be made clear by a few examples:

1. Justizrat Thomson lives in the Villa Wendtland at Gries, which is the property of his wife, who inherited it from her father. The villa and all its contents were sequestrated on September 21, last, and valued at 1,921,779 lire.

2. Frau Maria Entleuthner, a widow aged 71, owns in Meran a modest house worth about 50,000 lire, where she lives. Her sole means of livelihood are the rent that she obtains from letting the greater part of the house and what her daughter earns by giving piano lessons. Her house and all her furniture, including the beds and the daughter's piano and music, have been confiscated. She must pay rent for a room in her own house or be put on the street. She was forbidden by the authorities to cut firewood from a tree in the garden and was obliged to go without fire, having no means to buy coal.

3. Adolf Pott, aged 75, suffering from pulmonary disease, lives with his wife, aged 73, who suffers from heart disease, in a house at Meran which he owns. He has no income except what he derives from letting most of the house. His house and all his furniture, including beds, have been confiscated.

4. Frau Anna Hofele, widow, with four children under age, owns a house in Meran which is her only possession. The house and its furniture have been confiscated.

5. Agnes Ostwald, paralyzed and bedridden, has had her house and furniture confiscated.

6. The Krämer family, consisting of five brothers and sister under age, own a house which is their sole property. It has been confiscated.

7. Frau Kötsche, widow, aged 70, has had all her property confiscated.

8. Johann Musgiller, living in Algund, has had his house and garden, which are his only possessions, confiscated.

9. Baroness Lydia Hofmann, aged 80 and paralyzed, was formerly wealthy, but now lives entirely on the proceeds of her house and land in Meran. They have been confiscated.

These are only specimen cases. There are many others. Perhaps this brutality will help the world to understand the Fascist mentality.

Books for Ambassadors

By CARL VAN DOREN

(P. E. N., an organization of writers of all countries, has been holding in New York City its second international convention at which delegates from the foreign centers and from other American cities have gathered. We print below the words of the president of the American Center, at a dinner to the foreign delegates given on May 13.)

THE recent and present reputation of diplomacy is not so high as to encourage many of us to feel distressed at the hint that it might be improved upon or even at some points superseded. If, for instance, the works of Anatole France or Thomas Hardy or Gerhart Hauptmann or Maxim Gorki or Miguel Unamuno or Selma Lagerlöf or Benedetto Croce were the accredited representatives of their countries to all the foreign capitals, does any one seriously think that these countries would be represented to less advantage than they now are? Something of the sort, indeed, does happen whenever a great writer begins to have an influence beyond the borders of his own tongue and nation. But the spread of such influences has been left largely to chance, and no adequate mechanism has been developed whereby the finest seed of every nation might promptly be planted in all the soils ready to receive it.

This is a world in which vast forces slumber unused till some touch wakens them, or work destruction till some touch subdues them, to human usefulness. The heat of the sun and the rush of the winds and the throb of the tides are still in large measure wasted so far as the service of mankind is concerned. So, I am tempted to say, are the major emotions of the race incapable of their most precious functions till they have been civilized into words. The praise of silence as an evidence of strength is, after all, largely a form of sentimentalism. In this spirit the curled dandies of Rome patted the biceps of the sullen gladiators. Speech, however, is the faculty by which men have ceased to be brutes, leaving behind them, along with the fatal complacency of the oyster, his virtuous reticence. Certain primitive peoples have held that words, words themselves, are magic. And words are magic. They are flint to tinder, keys to locks, form to matter. And if this is true of words in general, how much more is it true of them when they are fitted with the inexplicable cunning of poets and orators to the subtle or beautiful or just ideas which would otherwise be hardly more useful, and hardly more verifiable, than sounds in a wilderness.

Words have a special magic for all who speak the special language to which they belong. Words have also a universal magic which may be translated into all languages. With it they carry across boundaries the riches discovered by many writers in many lands. They bring the news of strange beauties and fresh truths, thereby measurably enlarging every reader to something of cosmopolitan dimensions. And they have at the same time the different, but not actually contradictory, effect of drawing the most widely separated readers together by making them perceive how small are the essential differences between man and man. When the smallness of those differences has been genuinely perceived, there will no longer be room in the world for those obscene survivors of the ancient slime, hatreds and enmities and wars.

In the Driftway

THERE are evidently demons which infest old houses. They care little, however, for houses which are merely old; if they do not also show their age, the demons leave at once; and if you can find a house built about 1795, whose once-white clapboards lean ever so slightly to windward, whose green shutters hang awry on once-immaculate window sills, and whose shingled roof looks deceptively sound, you will also find the demons thick and hearty, leaning out of every window and door and beckoning the passer-by to enter. The strange thing about it is that so many passers-by accept this highly disadvantageous invitation. The Drifter has seen men and women of evidently sound mind, with no thought in the world of adding to the troubles which fate had already provided for them, go completely mad at the first sight of such a house. They prowl around the battered yard and stretch up to peer into the blank windows. They murmur that "this end really is perfectly good, and a little fixing would make the rest tight." They exclaim at sight of a bit of whittled wood or a carved mantel. The sight of a Dutch oven raises them to Heaven. And not content with merely looking and exclaiming and breathing loudly with joy, they turn to and buy the accursed place while the demons that inhabit it are howling with delight.

WITH this sort of madness the Drifter, of course, has no particular quarrel. But how the demons must rejoice when the purchasers begin their labors of "making the rest tight"! They are seen solemnly ripping out partitions to give more space here, and solemnly nailing them up to make another room there. They sandpaper old and peeling paint until their hands are sore. And the zeal with which they scrape wall-paper is encouraging to one who had thought that the taste for manual labor was going out. They do not complain if all their time and muscles are engaged, they do not mind spending all their money; when the house, at a cost of blood and treasure equal to at least one and one-half Spanish-American wars, is made sound and beautiful once more, the poor dupes, still led on by the untiring demons, turn to the barns and the chicken-house and the ice-house and the milk-house, and after toiling over them early and late they fill them with unprotesting beasts.

THERE is only one thing to be said for such an expenditure of energy and time: when the house is—not finished, for it never is—but comfortable and secure; when the barns contain a modest cow or two and a team fattened off one's own pasture; when the cucumbers that are sliced on the table are the same cucumbers that were hoed and weeded and picked with this hand—but there, the Drifter's imagination is running away with him. It is said, by those who have tried this experiment, that all these things afford an aesthetic satisfaction not procurable in any other way. The Drifter cannot speak for himself; he has never owned a cow or brought up a cucumber; he has never shingled his own roof or painted his own horse-barn a delirious red. Yet only a day or so ago he passed a house—not a new house, and yet really looking very sound; he was tempted; he would certainly have fallen if he had not chanced to see the crooked finger of a demon beckoning to him from a second-story window.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Who Pays?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A little leaflet is being spread broadcast which offers girls from thirteen to twenty prizes and a free trip to Washington for the best essays showing "Why a Young Man I Know Should Attend a Citizens' Military Training Camp." This offer, sponsored by the Women's Overseas Service League, ostensibly comes from them, though it is stated that essays will be submitted to the Military Training Camps Association and that they will give information.

As this little organization of women has only three hundred members in New England, only five thousand scattered over the whole country, and has not even a paid secretary, its offer to give a prize for the winning essay in every town, county, city, and State is surprising. One wonders how nurses and busy workers can furnish funds for such an ambitious undertaking.

It is said that several large organizations of women were first approached and turned down the proposal to sponsor action for any body of men who wanted to hide behind a woman's organization and not offend school boards and superintendents by enlisting schoolgirls in their propaganda. This very small organization finally welcomed the proposal and apparently will reap considerable advertising at no expense whatever to itself.

Boston, May 15

LUCIA AMES MEAD

Farmer-Labor—A Misalliance?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of March 19, and at various other times, I have noticed in your editorial columns references to what you presumably consider a desirable and natural eventuality—the creation of a national Farmer-Labor Party. It seems to me that in advocating such an alliance The Nation allows its zeal on behalf of the various underdogs of the world to overbalance its usual clear-sightedness.

Certainly there are no two groups more essentially dissimilar than the industrial laborer and the farmer. The agriculturist is above all a conservative; he is an employer of labor on a small scale, and by the nature of things he works long hours and pays very low wages. During boom periods in industry much of this cheap farm labor is drawn away from the farm to the factories, thus depriving the farmer of his help or forcing him to pay prohibitive wages. Also, periods of high wages in industry are usually periods of correspondingly high prices, and the farmer, with the rest of the general public, has to pay more for manufactured articles as a result of the high wages received by labor. Conversely, when prices of farm products rise, the effect is to increase the cost of living to the industrial workers in the cities. What helps the farmer is injurious to the laborer, and vice versa.

Ordinarily these two groups have nothing whatever in common; at the present they have but one thing in common, and that is discontent with the prevailing economic conditions. That both have some justification for such discontent goes without saying. But labor is in a chronic state of discontent, while the plight of the farmer is primarily a post-war condition. The strength of the Farmer-Labor Party and the Nonpartisan League and similar movements in the Northwest is the result of the wheat farmers allying themselves with the workers as a desperate means of relief from the sore straits they suddenly found themselves in after war-time prosperity—a sort of blind revolt. Such a coalescence, as of oil and water, cannot be stable. A Farmer-Labor alliance (it would be an alliance not a party) might under certain conditions sweep the country; but sooner or later it would inevitably split into its component elements.

Even supposing that there was some common bond of union between them, a party in power composed of members of these classes would be sure to enact vicious class legislation, harmful to the interests of the general public. It is true that there is little to be hoped for from either of the old parties. No sane liberal could desire to continue the Harding-Coolidge "business administration" regime, with its corruption—and protection of corruption—rampant; and there is no reason to suppose that any sweeping change would result from a Democratic victory. Hence, a third party—not tagged with the label of any particular class or group—to which progressives of both parties and all decent and honorable voters who do not want to lose all faith in or respect for American government could rally, is the need of the hour. The disease is serious, but the remedy does not lie in class rule or class legislation.

Pittsburgh, March 17

HANSON LEWIS

Our Animal Life Menaced

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Du Pont-Nemours munition company of Wilmington, Delaware, has inaugurated a bird-killing contest under the pretense that crows kill young animals and rob birds' nests. As even crows are known by experts to be better than their reputation, one would like to know what right a private corporation has to make this onslaught upon the animal life of this country. For the list of the doomed is not limited to crows, but includes grackles, kingfishers, blackbirds, hawks, owls, snapping turtles, cats, and other animals.

The fur-bearing animals are passing. Our five million licensed gunners are hurrying every sort of game to a fatal end. Squirrels and prairie dogs are doomed. Even the eagle, American emblem, has recently been slain to the number of twenty-five thousand. And our cats, if we happen to possess any, have a price offered for their heads, so that rifles and shot may be sold to private individuals, since there is no prospect of immediate war! It is not enough that "flower lovers" are robbing the country of the little conifers of our hills, the ground-pine, laurel, holly, all the wild flowers of woodland and meadow; that automobilists mutilate trees and shrubs at this time of the year, bringing home flowering dogwood and wild azalea by the carload, only to be sent, faded, to the garbage-can in a day or two!

When the gunners inspired by the Du Pont-Nemours offer have annihilated hawks and owls, the majority of which are harmless, how will the farmer protect his grain fields from rodents? These birds are the guardians of the grain fields, the hawks being on duty by day, the owls by night. The crow has a bad name and to some extent deserves it. But the Government has tested the crow at considerable cost. Thousands of crow stomachs from all over the country have been examined by the biological survey; reports from various sources were solicited and the fact was revealed that at least half of the food of the crow consisted of insects.

There is another aspect of this crime against our country. What of the moral effect of such contests upon our young people? Instead of reverence for life, they are taught to destroy it; instead of indulging in healthful outdoor sports, they learn to look upon nature as a free-for-all arena for the slaughter of innocents! Are our legislators, our women voters, our teachers, and our ministers going to allow this outrage to go on?

Summit, New Jersey, May 7

COUNTRY WOMAN

The Last of the Politicals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We wish to call to your attention some incidents which occurred recently and to give you certain information which was brought out during an interview held between the undersigned and Mr. James A. Finch, pardon attorney, in the Department of Justice.

Mr. Finch admitted frankly to our delegation, composed of a group of eleven women interested in free speech, that the Department of Justice had secured a long-term imprisonment in the penitentiary of a man named Fritz W. Bishoff through the activities of two of its men acting as agents provocateurs.

Our delegation called on Mr. Finch on May 6, to talk with him about the case of Nicholas S. Zogg, who was convicted in California in 1918, and has been in prison ever since. We asked why Zogg had not been given his liberty (he was accidentally not included among the I.W.W. prisoners granted an unconditional release by President Coolidge in December, 1923), when the President had commuted the twenty-five-year sentence of Fritz W. Bishoff, a German, sentenced in New Jersey in 1918, for attempting destruction of war munitions. Mr. Finch replied in substance that Bishoff was to be released and deported because he had actually not committed a crime; that he had been led by two of the Department's agents to express his readiness to perform an act of destruction of war munitions. These agents had incited the act of violence and then, anticipating the act, had apprehended and jailed their victim.

The objects of this letter are to call attention to the fact that the Department of Justice in this acknowledgment has admitted that it employs methods repugnant to the customs and traditions of America; and to the fact that Nicholas Zogg is still held in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary under a repealed espionage act, while all other political prisoners, and even suspected German spies, have been freed. Zogg was sentenced to ten years under the espionage act and two years under the draft act for opposing enlistment and aiding "prisoners of conscience." He is sixty years old, is ill with tuberculosis, and has already served six years.

Haverford, Pennsylvania, May 8

LAVINIA L. DOCK
ELLEN WINSOR

An Appeal from Strasbourg University

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Our work here at the university would be much easier if our libraries were not getting so poor in English and American publications. You will hardly believe it, though it is a fact, that the Germans had sadly neglected scientific productions hailing from both directions. Just to give one example. Our Poole's Index to Periodical Literature stops at 1902! And as those supplements are very hard to find at present and frightfully expensive for us, here we are, unable to ascertain what articles have been published for over twenty years on subjects which may interest us! Indeed I do not think that such a gap in the bibliographical equipment of any other of our universities of more than local importance could be found. I know that both at Lille and Lyons the work is on the shelves of the reference-room and much referred to.

I wonder if our friends in America could in any way help us to make up these deficiencies? I think they would be ready, if they knew the situation, to facilitate the acquisition of books, if not actually to give them. I have obtained special terms with some English publishers. Would not some American booksellers do the same? I would of course let our chief librarian know and every order would go through him.

ANDRE KOSZUL, Professor of the Faculty of Letters Strasbourg, Alsace, May 2

Poems to Minna

By MAXWELL BODENHEIM

I

An old gondola floats within your heart.
Its prows, like dark, prisoned rhythms,
Dispute the effervescence of its sides.
Vaporously stately, one dream stands
Within the boat and reprimands
A mandolin where pain lies stretched in strings

II

The backs of awakening mornings
Are cut by the edged feet of winds
And offer their wounds as sacrifice to the sun.
So do I rise to greet you.

The grief-turbaned night unfolds his arms
And scoops in stars, so that his thoughts
May wander with stolen eyes.
Such are my meditations on you.

III

The tint of your soul, like uncertain solitude,
Mingles with long curls of night's air,
And moonlight is born.
Gestures we cannot make
Weave shaking prisons for our hearts.
Life is less and more
Than the patch of moonlight placid near our feet.

IV

Your smile is like a wind
Juggling bits of color
And never letting them fall.
Happiness grows less heavy
On your face and almost Changes to the aftermath of grief.

Books

Andrew Mellon's Ignorance

Taxation: The People's Business. By Andrew W. Mellon. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

WHEN the day unhappily arrives for Secretary Mellon's grateful fellow-countrymen to erect a monument in his honor, they will undoubtedly carve a surtax on its east face and a tax-exempt security on its west. Pending that time, they will read with interest the excellent little book that he has written by fitting together a number of papers, and that the Macmillan Company has published in five days from the receipt of the manuscript. Mr. Mellon knows naught of economics, and less of the shifting and incidence of taxation. His book omits a large part of the relevant facts, its reasoning is bad, and its practical conclusions in general are dead wrong, but these flaws do not in the least detract from its excellence. For in it the Secretary of the Treasury, a successful banker, sets forth succinctly and simply the reasons why he honestly believes that the best way to make the United States prosperous is to take disproportionate taxes off wealthy business men. This gives those who disagree with the Secretary a chance to say why.

Mr. Mellon's limitations, which he shares with many other successful business men, are irrelevant to the main issue; yet his underlying assumptions must be understood by the reader who would grasp his argument. First, then, the United States is a land of equal opportunity, "which presupposes the right of each man to enjoy the fruits of his labor [and capital, too, doubtless] after contributing his fair share to the support of the Government, which protects him and his property." Our country owes its greatness (entirely, it appears) to the unfettered spirit of business adventure, and one learns with gladness that "any man of energy and initiative in this country can get what he wants out of life." "The Government," we discover, "is just a business, and can and should be run on business principles," and taxation is solely a means of getting the necessary revenue to run that business with as little disturbance to private enterprise as possible. The Secretary has apparently never heard of the difference between taxes that can and those that cannot be shifted, for he tells us that "high taxes have always meant a high price level, for the taxes are paid, in a large measure, by consumers all over the country." Further: "No thoughtful person longer doubts that, irrespective of his income, he pays a part of the high surtaxes in the general high price level." Some of us must confess, then, to being thoughtless; for we are fairly satisfied that a graduated income tax stays put on the man who pays it. In a world where the old gold standard of Europe has crashed down in irretrievable disaster, as practically all competent monetary theorists now admit, the Secretary complacently approves our own better luck and suggests that Europe must follow our example—a fair indication, perhaps, of his real competence to deal with the problems of statesmanship that confront the modern finance minister.

One more preliminary, to illustrate the reasoning of the book:

Assuming that all inheritances, large and small, were taxed at 40 per cent, it would then be only two or three generations until private ownership of property would cease to exist. Since these taxes are used in the current operation of the Government, the result would be not that the Government had absorbed the wealth of the country, but that the wealth had been spent and none was left. [!]

Was ever more preposterous nonsense soberly set down on paper? In the Secretary's world do no generations work and create new wealth in the intervals between dying? Estates on the average are transmitted not oftener than once in thirty years. Let Mr. Mellon the banker call in a young man from one of his savings banks, and ask for a compound-interest table. He will discover that a depositor leaving a dollar in his bank today will get $3.24 out of the bank in 1954. Let the luckless inheritor of $10,000,000, then, pay over $4,000,000 to a reckless and grasping government, and put the remaining $6,000,000 into Mr. Mellon's savings bank with a good conscience and a cheerful heart. In thirty years three alone out of his six millions will have multiplied to ten, ready for fresh government exactions, and on the remaining three the wretched capitalist may meantime for that thirty years, quite without work, have enjoyed $120,000 interest a year kindly handed over to him by Mr. Mellon's bank—and even so he will leave thirteen millions to his son against the ten he received from a provident father. But perhaps Mr. Mellon never heard of the productiveness of capital; for all we know, he may be a Marxian, and believe that labor is the sole source of value. Even so he need not quote "three generations from shirt-sleeve to"—piffle!

But to come to the main argument. High surtaxes crush the spirit of business adventure, and drive our cowed capitalists with broken spirits tamely to shift their funds into tax-exempt federal, State, and municipal securities, thus encouraging an orgy of governmental waste and starving productive, that is, profitable, private industry. All this is supported by indubitable figures showing the decline of revenues from the upper brackets of the surtaxes. To the uncritical mind, to which variety, it must be confessed, the Secretary appeals, the conclusion seems irresistible that there is nothing to do but reduce the wicked surtaxes to the sacred maximum of 25 per cent, a figure apparently ordained of God at which good capitalists will put their good money into productive private enterprises and not shift it in discouragement and despair into unproductive and wasteful State and municipal undertakings like good roads and water and light plants and schools and such foolishness. The Secretary's evidence consists essentially in figures showing the progressive decline in the number of taxable incomes above $300,000 from 1,296 in 1916 to 246 in 1921, and in their amount from $993,000,000 to $154,000,000, together with a statement from Henry Ford, and letters from Daniel Guggenheim and a dressmaker in Kentucky saying that the high surtaxes are discouraging them from further investment in business, not to speak of much assertion and some facts concerning the amount of tax-exempt securities outstanding, estimated at $12,300,000,000, and increasing by about a billion a year since 1918.

Now, those who have followed the debate on Mr. Mellon's proposals, instead of simply listening to the chorus of praise in the Eastern newspapers, know that both his statements and his arguments have emerged from the fray pretty badly tattered. Of course, the incomes subject to surtax declined from 1916-17, the period of "war brides" and fabulous fortuitous profits, to 1921, a year of profound depression and speculative losses; but all indications are that the surtaxes will yield 50 per cent more in 1923 than in 1921. Of course there has been dodging of the high surtaxes, and as an army of venal lawyers has been put to work finding ways of legal evasion, plenty of holes in the tax law have been found. But how, in the name of common sense, if you cannot collect a surtax of 50 per cent, can you collect one of 25? To an untutored intelligence, the moral would seem to be to stop the holes in the tax, and the Secretary himself offers some excellent suggestions to that end.

But what of the starving of private business by capital going into tax-exempts? It is nonsense, and the facts show it clearly. True enough, issues of State and municipal securities for functions that suffered during the war have constituted since 1919 a distinctly larger proportion of all security issues than before the war, but the Secretary's own table shows that such issues fell from 28.7 per cent of the total in 1921 to 20.7 per cent in 1923. Such percentages, however, prove nothing. According to Mr. Mellon's own table, 1923 shows the largest issue of new corporate securities in our history, and 1922 was exceeded only by the wild year 1920, when the surtaxes stood at 65 per cent. Does this prove that capital is withdrawing into the tax-exempt field? 1923 was the greatest building year that we have ever known; the railroads disposed of a billion dollars in extensions; public utilities grew at a tremendous rate; automobile factories boomed. There was no difficulty in finding the necessary capital, and the present slackening of business suggests the ever-recurring disagreeable question whether during the boom period we have not overdone the business of producing new plant in private profit-making industries. The brute fact is that the damping down of the spirit of enterprise and the starvation of private business as a result of the surtaxes does not exist outside the fiery imagination of the Secretary and his claque. The whole structure of fact built up to support the dream crumbles upon examination.

What, then, remains? An instructive exhibit. Mr. Mellon honestly believes that the best way to make the United States prosperous is to give her big business men a free hand to make all the profits they can, paying meanwhile as light taxes as possible in running a government whose functions are to be limited to the protection of life and property. In that faith he has already got rid of the excess-profits taxes and has cut the surtaxes from their war maximum of 65 per cent. The big-business community in too large part is in the same medieval state of economic knowledge and fiscal theory that is set forth in the Secretary's book. But most intelligent theorists, and the body of responsible European statesmen as well, recognize that, whether we realize it or not, taxation is, in fact, a mighty engine of economic and social policy, and that present-day conditions demand its use by men with eyes and minds wide open to its effects on the distribution as well as the production of wealth. Mr. Mellon is not such a man.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Admirable Anatole

On Life and Letters. By Anatole France. A translation by Bernard Miall. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

THE journalism of a novelist, journalism already three decades old (the preface is dated 1892), but journalism that is also literature, and all as fresh as the bloom in the cheeks of the young virgin exhumed on the Appian Way, "who, by some prodigy of ancient magic, was lying uncorrupted in this faithful bed." Beauty is that magic preservative. These pages are drenched in it as the sea in the golden light of September. They are treasure galleons that sail ballasted with the bullion of learning, their hulls gleaming and glistening with flashes of wit.

M. France writes An Apology for Plagiarism: "A situation belongs not to him who was the first to discover it, but to him who has impressed it strongly upon the memory of mankind"; he rehabilitates the Emperor Julian, "He has afforded the world the unique spectacle of a tolerant fanatic"; reviewing Boissier's "The End of Paganism," he shows it to have been but the prelude to a new beginning—"The Church triumphant was vanquished by scholastic philosophy . . . and by this antique beauty that only slumbered when men thought it dead"; or he reconjures the enigmatic personality of Cleopatra, and her passions leave, as did the young girl of Pompeii, the imprint of their breast in the ashes of time.

Through this cunningly and richly woven tapestry of his scholarship run the golden threads of the Hellenist, gleaming with sudden beauty of phrase and glinting with flashes of irony. Does he write of Pascal? It is to remark:

He wrote a book which the perfection of art has made immortal. And he despised all the arts, even the art of writing, nor was there any sort of beauty which did not fill him with horror as a principle of concupiscence. A sick man, unable to sleep, he jotted down at night, on scraps of paper, notes for an apology for the Christian religion; and these notes, which were published after his death, and were regarded with suspicion by the Catholics, have for 200 years been the delight of freethinkers and skeptics.

And his irony plays smilingly about the venerable figure of the atheistic-pessimistic poetess, Mme Ackermann:

She broke with one who had been her friend from childhood because the poor lady, then more than sixty years of age, had one day when sitting by the fire passed the tongs to a very old gentleman with too sensual a manner! I was there when the thing happened. I remember we were speaking of Kant and the categorical imperative. For my part, I saw nothing that was not innocent in these two old people and the tongs. Nevertheless, the lady sitting by the fire was driven forth never to return.

In all this work, journalistic yet literature, one is aware of an old, an august, an immense tradition of learning, of style, and of high excellence. Even among English men of letters, more fastidious than ourselves, few write as well as this, and if they do they are promptly rated curiosities, "styl-ists." This high finish, this art, laborious yet always fresh and vivacious, is a thing to make the average writer of English look and feel like a schoolboy. Here is a volume, however humble in its own estate, which it would nevertheless be well for young American journalists to read and study. There is no reason why our newspapers and reviews should be written so badly. All the art and resource of the novelist can be mustered into the service of journalism, and, in the great function of public instruction which has fallen like the prophet's mantle from literature to journalism, these resources should be so utilized.

Meanwhile, our journalistic writing, when it does not spring from an intellectual soil which is shallow and light, is likely to be heavy, portentous, and self-conscious. Where, even among pens of the rank supposably to be assigned to the admirable Anatole thirty-two years ago, have we one capable of tracing pages so strewn with cameo and medallion, so packed with epigram, fine feeling, acute discrimination, breadth of scholarship and depth of thought, all advanced with such conversational ease and matchless fluency, and irradiated by that smile of irony, lucid and tranquil, with just the suspicion of a mockery at corners of the grave mouth, but gray irids slightly brightened to a gleam of archness? "Again, M. Boissier exhibits an excessive disdain for the Manichaeans. He does not sufficiently consider that they were theologians." Fun is going on; the keenest of intellectual jokes. It is merely a question of whether we have the wit to enjoy them.

LUCIEN PRICE

The Freudian Drama

The Re-Creating of the Individual. By Beatrice M. Hinkle, M. D. A Study of Psychological Types and Their Relation to Psychoanalysis. With illustrations. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

THE recognition is spreading that Freudian psychology has expanded well beyond its original prospect and aims to describe the life-orbit of the human psyche. Like other intellectual developments, such as the Darwinian, originating in the interests and problems of a pioneer, it has been extended to other and larger applications. Such shift of emphasis directs the germinal idea to a reach and import beyond the initial contribution. While the Darwinian foundations were catholic and stimulating to cooperative efforts, the Freudian beginnings were unfortunate in temper and content. The doctrines were crude and extravagant, following a trail that in many another pursuit had led to a swamp and not to terra firma. Dissensions arose among Freud's followers, once tardy recognition was accorded; the aggression of Freud, the offensive sexualizing of the mind's occupations, the menace to followers morbidly attracted added to the general suspicion. Psychoanalysis has yet to be saved from its unwise advocates. In such service Dr. Hinkle's volume is a promising aid.

Its inspiration goes back to 1910 and her initiation into psychoanalysis under the tutelage of Jung at Zurich. Dr. Hinkle is concerned with "dissolving the psychic inhibitions and strictures limiting mankind." The background is that of clinical experience; but the contribution is a psychological thesis. Jung's psychological types are accepted as fundamental: the extravert and the introvert. To these Dr. Hinkle adds two border classifications: the subjective extravert and the emotional introvert. The extravert is the more usual, normal, objective, simple. His contact with life is with things and actions.

The possible existence of any "other world" than that apprehended by the five senses is totally unknown to them [extraverts], and for "all inner problems," dissatisfactions concerned with one's material welfare, or "non-sense about other-worldness," they have no patience, and consider for all such ailments a liver pill is the remedy. These are the practical-minded individuals, hard-headed business men, scientists, and philosophers whose vision and understanding are limited to one dimension.

By contrast the introvert is more variable, less amenable to formulas, and as an emotional introvert becomes a candidate for neuroses. He is subjective and tender-minded as the extravert is objective and tough-minded. He uses the feeling function freely for adaptation, gives attention to intuitions (or "hunches") and impressions, is moody, unstable, and personalized in attitude, perplexed by inner hesitations, entangled in introspective conflicts—all in varying shades and degrees. Nations exhibit similar contrasts; introverted Germany makes a mess of its objective policies, while extraverted England bungles through, confident, plastic, close to reality, avoiding didactic ideals and effusions. Lloyd George becomes the subjective extravert, dexterous, shifting—"an object lesson in the art of opportunism."

For Freud the human drama proceeds as a problem play—sexual in theme, incidents, motive. For Jung sex is in all truth dominant enough, and in his exposition of myths and phantasies is elaborated to depths or heights beyond Freud's ventures, but the individual emerges above sex; while for Adler the ego definitely determines the drama, though still as a "masculine protest," with the inferiority complex as the typical handicap. The will to power is recognized as a leit-motiv, and the mechanisms of scenes and episodes derive from the versatile urges to self-expression. Dr. Hinkle posits an upward trend toward a completer, richer ego as inherent in human striving. Man has an authentic urge for fulfilment, a prospective aim, a hope, an ambition, not merely an avoidance of regression to earlier stages of psychic life, a bare seeking of absolution from "unredeemed evil wishes," but a "hunger for individualization." This is the Hamlet of her drama of recreation—an introspective, sublimated, even neurotic Dane, yet one reflecting the forward urge of human potencies. "The neurotic will lead the way [to] inner morality and a stable transformation of instinct into higher psychic forms."

Freud's sexualized version of the human drama leads to "the monstrous crime of Oedipus," ever repeating itself in the neural temptation that is the heritage of the race. Less neurotically expressed, it becomes the menace of parental domination that fixes the attachment of son to mother, of daughter to father, and thwarts or twists the emergence of adolescent emancipation. It reaches from apron-strings to incest. Much of this interpretation Dr. Hinkle rejects for the cumulative reason that it limits the human plot, ignores the undeveloped psychology of the child, and is arbitrary and unfounded. The human drama is much more of a world-affair than a family-affair; biological and psychological moments and forces demand a broader rendering.

A characteristic application within Dr. Hinkle's program restores the psychic differences of sex, which over-reliance upon the findings of intelligence and scholastic tests had summarily minimized.

Woman's history is the story of an unending repression of her desire and effort to transcend instinct. . . . The greater firmness and integration of the ego function in man is the result of his age-long struggle to conquer the collective powers of nature and shape them to his will.

One may question whether a feminist loyalty has not unduly influenced the author's rendering of the eternal feminine while indorsing the central conclusion that men and women, rather than performers of this and that persuasion and predilection, constitute the comédie humaine. The artist is portrayed as a Freudian character. His function is posed as a non-biological creativeness, thus saddling a negation with a questionable analogy, such as leads to the typical Freudian misconception. A work of art is described as a product of "a psychic coitus between the puer eternus and the soul"—a formulation likely to rearouse the animus which Dr. Hinkle aims to dispel.

Dr. Hinkle's main theme is the re-creation of the individual by raising his potencies to a richer, more highly synthesized life. Healing is but freeing the psychic energies. The thesis is engaging. It uses the contrast of what man must outgrow, and through civilization has in a measure outgrown, to attain an adequate view of life, as an encouragement of the forward urge to ego maximization. The conclusion doubtless posits a too high or too "highbrow" level of the urges, traits, occupations, and ambitions of the typically human exemplar. The common lot in the human drama proceeds more simply. Few live significantly. Happiness is supposed to dwell more congenially on the plains than on the heights; even though the days of advocacy of the simple life by exemplars of complexity is over. The vogue of psychoanalysis is itself a tribute to the pride in complexity (often an abnormal complication) by those yearning to "live their own lives." Posed at their extremes, the characters in the Freudian and the average human drama seem to refer to different orders of creatures. Yet the Freudian dramatist in his less extreme moods has made a real contribution to the motive sources of the human plot and action and to the comprehension of the staging of the human scene.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Elegy

Mirage. By Edgar Lee Masters. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

"MIRAGE" has not the fine epic sweep of "The Nuptial Flight," nor the exactness and closeness of characterization. But it tries for neither, being, in fact, a book of an entirely different mood and intention. It is, though not unhappily always well written, a poet's rather than a novelist's novel. Mr. Masters has the full equipment of the novelist and his book has story, character, even action. But what it expresses is the final vision about life of a poet who has searched in both books and experience, in love and landscape and activity, in observation of the devious ways of men, after the riddle of the painful earth. His conclusion, his final vision is in harmony with the conclusion about life to which other poets have also come. But he states it in a minor key, an elegiac mood. Once he must have shared, in its least ignoble aspect, the moral illusionism and cultural optimism so common in America, and his mind has never recovered from the hurt of finding these earlier hopes and faiths delusive. For what, in the end, he sees as the character of life is very much what Goethe saw. "If a soul learns all that it can from books and life, from error and suffering, what better consummation can it have?" That is, even in its wording, very close to the doctrine of Weimar. And so is this: "And if we never find our heart's delight, and never learn much, we have learned the secret of what it is to search." Only Goethe was contented with life as a spiritual adventure. Mr. Masters, forced to the same conclusion, is almost depressed.

The reason for this depression which is, in the actual story, the depression of Skeeters Kirby, lawyer, lover, man of letters, American, can perhaps be found in the concrete experiences that led Kirby to his conclusions, rather than in the character of the conclusions themselves. The men and women who surround Kirby, who form both his background and his fate, are a sorry lot. It is a world of dreary gaiety, joyless indulgence, a world quite without goodness of heart—I do not mean correctness of conduct—quite hard and shallow and therefore overwhelmingly dispiriting. I am not, of course, quarreling with Mr. Masters for showing us such a world and certainly not with Kirby for being driven by it into a depressed and moody philosophic nihilism. I am trying to show the inner coherence between the book's moods and conclusions and the world out of which it arises.

That world is shown with both breadth and precision. Becky Norris is a magnificent full-length portrait of an utterly detestable woman. The portrait is overwhelmingly true to life. She is weak except in selfishness, parsimonious except in the indulgence of her desires, false to the bone, a liar of that most dangerous kind which does not lie consciously but believes out of the mad arrogance of her parasitic nature that what she finds convenient and profitable is also true. Poor Kirby, having set his heart on her and never able, apparently, to liberate himself by an act of moral vision, necessarily sickens in soul. And this feminine type runs through the book not only in the person of Becky Norris, but through the characters of her friends and through the implications of the philosophy of Bob Hayden and the story of the wretched Mitford. It would be a mistake, however, to call Mr. Masters a misogynist. The type he shows exists—a strange, poisonous fruit of a confused civilization. His story is description, invective, warning. As such, and also as a statement of a man's wisdom wrung from bitter experience, it has eloquence, significance, and power.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

An Early Idyll

The Prelude (Le Prélude). By Paul Gerdely. Paris: Librairie Stock.

THIS novel, by an author who is among the most popular of his country in verse, short story, and drama, makes a more serious claim than any of his other ventures. The fatal facility that so often betrays the French, that rendered Gerdely's poems, for all their subtlety, merely clever light verse, is restrained in "The Prelude," transfused into clear simplicity and delicacy. The straightforward narrative is pastoral in quality, surprisingly calm in the tumult of recent French fiction—the more unexpected because Gerdely is known as the subtle psychologist of love, and his finest analysis is demanded by the story.

"The Prelude" is the account, in retrospect, of the one adventure that preceded Henri's happy marriage. The lad, in a moment's rebellion on discovering that he was already being absorbed by the family of his friend Helene, broke away for a summer in the Alps alone. There he met and was won by another Helene, who seemed the goal of the search on which his questioning spirit had impelled him. In her arms, however, Henri discovered what Cabell, here, seems always to proclaim, that the dream woman ever eludes us, that the familiar flesh harbors a stranger. Helene, who is unhappily married, seems really to love him; but she bids him a regretful farewell, recognizing that her full measure of feeling is not returned when he shrinks from giving her a child. After a year of dimming memories, Henri is drawn back to the first Helene, with the conviction—realized in their later life—that they will grow in mutual love.

The sympathy that envelops this chaste idyll—for it is tenderly, chastely told—derives much of its depth from the author's earnestness. Gerdely is pursuing an idea through his story. It is an idea that reveals a seriousness of purpose in the youth of France (for Gerdely writes of its reception "Les jeunes gens sont complètement avec moi"): the thesis that love in a sensitive being involves the need of self-perpetuation, that men and women do not love until they desire a child by the beloved. This impulsion moves in Henri toward his wife; toward it "The Prelude" flows. Unclouded by the idea it embodies, however, the story is like the laughing surface of a sun-lit well in the depths of which smiles that beauty which is truth.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Books in Brief

Temper. By Lawrence H. Conrad. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

One by one, the industries which contemporary America holds nearest its heart come jauntily into the workshop of the novelist. Among the most recent to drop—perhaps one should say drop-forged—into fiction is the automobile factory. Mr.

Conrad provides a vivid background; his picture of modern industry is carefully documented and done with more than average intensity. Manifestly he has observed the scene with intelligence as well as sympathy.

On Strange Altars. By Paul Jordan-Smith. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

The author of "Cables of Cobweb" leads the reader into his private literary chapel and points out his favorite shrines—James Joyce, Mark Twain, Rabelais, Samuel Butler, Casanova, and other outspoken ancients and moderns. His critical impressions are solidly, although at times a trifle elaborately, presented; his style, as well as his philosophy, seems to owe something to each of his favorites, but possibly this may simply be out of compliment to them.

The Hussy. By Boine Grainger. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Here is another pot shot at the conventions—a novel which might be described in one of Floyd Dell's phrases as "a tactful discourse upon the morality of having lovers—in the continental sense." The author projects a distinctly tough-minded heroine, intent upon living her own life and embracing the new morality whenever convenient. Treated ironically, the story might have had stronger values—but doubtless less popular ones.

Rare Vanishing and Lost British Birds. Compiled from Notes by W. H. Hudson. By Linda Gardiner. With 25 Colored Plates by H. Gronvold. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

A beautiful if melancholy book, based upon a pamphlet published by Hudson in 1894 but substantially enlarged by the addition of notes found among his papers. It is a quiet yet eloquent record of human stupidity, a peculiar irony residing in Hudson's judgment that among the three chief agencies of destruction—the sportsman, the gamekeeper, and the collector—the third is the most effective.

Visible and Invisible. By E. F. Benson. George H. Doran Company. $2.

There is more horror than mystery in these tales of the psychic; in fact there is more mystery in working out the syntax of some of the author's explanatory sentences than in foretelling the solution of his problems. However, Mr. Benson has found a simple and effective formula with which, given a corpse or a medium or a strange footprint, he can concoct a story of required length and necessary number of thrills.

Tolstoi: the Teacher. By Charles-Baudouin. Authorized translation by Fred Rothwell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Those who fear that the disciples of Tolstoi will make him as distasteful as the Browning societies have made the poet cannot accuse M. Baudouin of adding to the great Russian's unpopularity. This is not another sentimental effusion about the ideal universe as it might be run by realizing the gospel of Tolstoi. It is a serious study in pedagogy especially designed to meet the needs of the child. M. Baudouin, who is an educator in his own right, interprets Tolstoi the humanist and practical man.

Drama

"June and the Paycock"

THE Abbey Theater, Dublin, is a somber little playhouse, rather bleak, and crude in equipment; yet it has brought to light some of the most notable works of modern dramatic art. The late John M. Synge, W. B. Yeats, Padraic Colum, Lady Gregory, Seumas O'Kelly, Lord Dunsany have sat in the stalls to watch their own premiers; while from it, a few seasons ago, issued the company which toured America with Lennox

Robinson's "The Whiteheaded Boy." I doubt, however, whether any piece has been seen at the Abbey finer than "June and the Paycock." The week of its production literary Dublin talked of little else. Mr. Yeats, Lennox Robinson, Æ were in agreement as to its high and impartial fidelity; and Lady Gregory (who, being one of the directors of the theater, had read "June" in manuscript) journeyed all the way from her home in the west of Ireland to see it performed. James Stephens said of the play that "it is plumped like an orange, full of sap." One of the local dramatic critics gave as his opinion: "Mr. O'Casey is the nearest approach to a genius we have had in Irish literature for the stage in a very considerable time."

And this "genius" is a bricklayer's assistant, plying his trade from day to day. He could not attend a tea in the green-room of the Abbey to which I was asked, because there wouldn't be time to wash the mortar off his hands and get into respectable garb. Sean O'Casey lives in a single room, furnished with a bed, a chair, a table, and a lamp. His passion is books. I learned what he did with his royalty receipts for the opening two weeks: got the cheque cashed immediately and went down to the second-hand bookshops along the quai, where he indulged in an orgy. As a child he begged in the streets for his food. Today he is able to eat only the plainest and most frugal fare, because his digestive organs have been ruined by starvation. Now that he is in the way of becoming famous, the attitude of his fellows in the bricklaying world has changed: they think him a snob. They do not know Sean O'Casey.

June, far from being a Grecian goddess, is a woman of the Dublin slums, so nicknamed because she chanced to have been born in June; "paycock" is simply dialect for the bird of gorgeous tail plumage. The fact that this is a play about Dublin life makes it in a sense unique. With depictions of peasant character and manners, patrons of the Abbey have grown very familiar. It was left to a hod-carrier to give them the capital—not Dublin's gay and intellectual side, to be sure, but a cross-section, marvelously real, of its slums. Mr. O'Casey, who understands the people about whom he writes, knocks out a wall, and we behold the living apartment of a two-room tenement flat inhabited by the Boyle family.

It is a barren domicile—not so very different from his own, I fancy; just a few wooden chairs, a rough table, crazy curtains at the windows, and the walls presenting various strata of paper, tattered in spots, patched in others. A poor fire smolders on the hearth, where we see a kettle for tea and a pan containing a solitary sausage. On the mantelpiece an alarm clock reposes face downward, that being the only position in which it will function as a clock. Before a picture of the Virgin a small light burns.

The plot is simple. At times one feels it to be non-existent, and yet there is a plot. The play is expertly, if not in all respects flawlessly, put together. Its story is woven about the tragic figure of Johnny Boyle, the young son of the house, who in 1916 was a Republican, taking part in the Easter Week uprising, where he lost an arm. Now he has become a Free Stater, and, shortly before the time in which the action begins (1922), has given some evidence against a former Republican comrade who, having failed to change his politics, is shot by soldiers of the Free State. Johnny cowers under an abject, disorganizing dread of the retribution he feels relentlessly closing in. The Republicans are on his track; he is a marked man. So long, he believes, as the little red flame is there before the Virgin's picture, harm cannot reach him. And in this superstition seems to reside a kind of terrible authenticity. The light burns on; but in the last act it flickers—it goes out. Two gunmen are at the door, their pistols leveled. Johnny Boyle is to go with them, no matter where or for what purpose. It is the end: another victim to the insatiate lust of civil warfare.

The author takes advantage, dramatically, of the death of the young Republican, for which Johnny is indirectly responsible, bringing the bereaved mother, in the second act, to the door of the Boyle flat, where she pauses on her way to the grave. "It's a sad journey we're goin' on," sobs a woman who is with her, "but God is good, an' the Republic won't be always down." Scant consolation this, however, proves.

MRS. TANCRED. Ah, what good is that to me now? Whether they're up or down won't bring me darlin' son back from the grave.

NEIGHBOR. Still an' all, he died a noble death, an' we'll bury him like a king.

MRS. TANCRED. Ah, what's the pains I suffered bringin' him into the world to carry him to his cradle, to the pains I'm sufferin' now, carryin' him out o' the world to bring him to his grave? . . . Mother o' God, Mother o' God, have pity! O blessed Virgin, where were you when me darlin' son was riddled with bullets? . . . Sacred heart of the Crucified Jesus, take away our hearts o' stone . . . an' give us hearts o' flesh. . . . Take away this murderin' hate . . . an' give us Thine own eternal love!

It is a note of anguish destined to repetition, even in phrase; for although June Boyle, watching the funeral procession from a window, can mutter: "Maybe it's nearly time we had a little less respect for the dead, an' a little more respect for the livin'," yet, when her son's turn arrives, in a frenzy she lifts her hands to heaven and voices the same prayer: "Take away this murderin' hate . . . an' give us Thine own eternal love!" The words drop like burning tears of agony—an agony so awful that, sitting there in the desolate dark of the theater, the wind coldly shaking the exit doors, the witnesses' heart is torn with pain and compassion. The debacle, in its poignancy unbearable almost is yet keyed to the noble elevation of Greek tragedy which, throughout, visits Sean O'Casey's play with the distinguishing mark of greatness.

June is described, in the author's manuscript, as a woman of forty-five. "Her face has assumed that look which ultimately settles down upon the faces of the working class: a look of listless monotony and harassed anxiety, blending with an expression of mechanical resistance." It is she whose shoulders endure the weight of the household. Her son is shattered. Her husband will not work when he can possibly avoid it (though his mouth is full of brave talk). To Mary, the daughter, who has turned Socialist, June wearily replies:

Ah, wear whatever ribbon you like, girl, only don't be botherin' me. I don't know what a girl on strike wants to be wearin' a ribbon round her head for or silk stockin's on her legs either. It's wearin' them things that make the employers think they're givin' you too much money.

Yes, life for June is neither smooth nor sweet. Yet there is a snatch of pseudo good-fortune ahead; for a "will," purporting to leave to her husband, "Captain" Boyle, a snug sum of money, suddenly drops into the family lap. The facts behind that document are these: A certain school-teacher and amateur theosophist named Charlie Bentham (a man much higher in the social scale than the Boyles), has looked upon Mary and found her worthy his desire. By way of wooing—for in the Dublin slums it is not considered good form for a girl sunk in poverty to be courted by a man of affluence or position—Bentham represents himself as a legal ambassador authorized to handle the will (which he has fabricated). The Boyles are to be well off as soon as it becomes operative. Mary succumbs at once, throwing over a lover of her stratum, Jerry Devine.

Old Man Boyle, flushed with the wine of this unexpected windfall, borrows right and left from his neighbors, so that no time may be lost in beginning to enjoy the legacy. He orders clothes from a tailor. New furnishings turn the flat into a gaudy abode: one with difficulty recognizes the tenement living-room of former times when the curtain rises on the second act. Of course this eldorado lasts only long enough for Bentham to have his way with Mary and then, in the traditional fashion, to depart on other adventures, leaving her with child. Nemesis is fiendishly thorough. Creditors descend. The tailor confiscates "Captain" Boyle's prized new suit (not paid for). Movers denude the flat of its grandeur. Johnny is snatched by Republicans to his death—this once more emphasizing the background of political chaos: of murder, destruction, the violence of an age drunk and mad.

And yet, curiously enough, plentifully equipped, too, is this grim play with comedy, which in essence seems more heart-breaking than the outcome itself. "Captain" Boyle is at all times a tragi-comic figure, portrayed as a man of about sixty-five, stout, gray-haired. His neck is short, and his head looks like a stone ball such as one sometimes sees on top of a gate-post. His cheeks, reddish-purple, are puffed out, as if he were always repressing an almost irrepressible ejaculation. He carries himself with the upper part of his body slightly thrust forward. His walk is a slow inconsequential strut. His clothes are dingy, and he wears a faded seaman's cap with a glazed peak.

Boyle's title, "Captain," derives from his having once taken a trip in a collier from Dublin to Liverpool; but he likes to pose as a mighty man of the sea. We savor this legend in one of the dialogues between Boyle and his boon companion, "Joxer" Daly, whose face is "like a bundle of crinkled paper," whose eyes hold a cunning twinkle, and who has "a habit of constantly shrugging."

They sit together over the "Captain's" breakfast of sausage, while the voice of a coal vender is heard chanting outside in the street: "Blocks . . . coal blocks! Blocks . . . coal blocks!" This apparently starts a train of thought.

BOYLE. Them was days, Joxer, them was days! Nothin' was too hot or too heavy for me then. Sailin' from the Gulf o' Mexico to the Antarctic Ocean. I seen things—I seen things, Joxer—that no mortal man should speak about that knows his Cathecism. Often an' often, when I was fixed to th' wheel with a marlinspike, an' the win's blowin' fierce, an' the waves lashin' till you'd think every minute was goin' to be your last, an' it blowed an' blowed—blow is the right word, Joxer, but blowed is what the sailors use—JOXER. Oh, it's a darlin' word, a daarin' word!

BOYLE. An' as it blowed an' blowed, I often looked up at the sky an' assed meself the question: What is the stars? What is the stars?

VOICE OF COAL VENDER. Any blocks, coal blocks! Blocks, coal blocks!

JOXER. Ah, that's the question, that's the question: What is the stars?

BOYLE. An' then, I'd have another look, an' I'd ass meself: What is the moon?

A wonderful scene, annihilating in its futility, its maudlin talk of stars and moon, with a coal vender crying his wares. It even held a sort of eerie beauty.

Then there is the joust in the second act, to celebrate the Boyles's turn of fortune. Impromptu songs are sung. Never to be forgotten is the duet from "Il Trovatore," between mother and daughter: full of tremolos and uncertainties; full of a pride on June's part and of a shy girlish confusion on Mary's—for Bentham is present, and she must do herself justice. Finally, the gramophone is turned on. And it is this hilarious scene which is broken by Mrs. Tancred, with her prayer to the heart of the Crucified Jesus.

Light and shade are extraordinarily crocheted. The play is veritable growth of the soil: complete, unsparing, and true—like the performance. Sara Allgood as June, Barry Fitzgerald as the "Captain," and F. J. McCormick as "Joxer," lifted their roles to a plain of creation, with art that never once showed threadbare. The Johnny of Arthur Shields was a finely studied characterization; and I have never seen a more exquisite bit of work in the theater than Eileen Crowe's picture of Mary singing before her lover.

After the smash-up, "Captain" Boyle goes out with "Joxer" to drown his sorrows. It is these two unspeakable old cronies, returned at night to a room bereft of all save a smoky lamp, who conclude the piece:

BOYLE. If th' worst comes to th' worst, I'll join . . . a flyin' column! I did me bit in Easter Week—had no business to be there . . . but Captain Boyle's Captain Boyle!

JOXER. Breathes there a man with soul so de—ad . . . this me—ow—n . . . me native . . . land!

BOYLE. Commandant Kelly . . . died in them arms, Joxer. "Tell me Volunteer butties," says he, "that I . . . died for . . . Ireland!"

JOXER. D'jever read Willy Reilly an' his Own Colleen Bawn?

BOYLE. I'm tellin' you, Joxer, th' whole worl's in a terrible state o' chassis!

JOXER. Ah . . . it's a darlin' book! A daarin' . . . book!

The curtain mercifully intervenes; one could endure no more.

EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL

LECTURES and DEBATES

The New School for Social Research

469 West 23rd Street

announces a lecture by

BERTRAND RUSSELL on Analysis of Mind

Monday, May 26, at 8:20 P. M.

Admission $1.

Bon Voyage - Bon Voyage

Farewell Lecture

by

BERTRAND RUSSELL

subject

"How to Be Free and Happy"

Dealing with our superstitions—our moral and economic taboos

AT COOPER UNION, WED. EVE., May 28, at 8:15

NORMAN HAPGOOD, Chairman.

Farewell Committee Headed by

REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES, HEYWOOD BROWN, H. L. MENCKEN and LEWIS G. GANNETT

Tickets—83c and $1.10—All Seats Reserved. For Sale at Rand School, 7 E. 15th St., and Civic Club, 14 W. 12th St.

Auspices Free Youth. Room 504. 7 East 15th St. Stuyvesant 4620.

This Sunday!

The DEBATE
of the Day!

BERTRAND
RUSSELL
versus
SCOTT
NEARING

Chairman
SAMUEL UTERMAYER
SUBJECT:

This Sunday!!

Can the SOVIET IDEA
take hold of AMERICA
ENGLAND
and FRANCE?

RESOLVED: That the Soviet form of government is applicable to Western civilization

MR. RUSSELL, Negative

MR. NEARING, Affirmative

THIS SUNDAY, May 25th, at 3 P. M.

CARNEGIE HALL, 57th St. and 7th Avenue

Tickets: $3.00, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00 plus war tax

On sale at Jimmie Higgins Book Shop, 127 University Pl., nr. 14th.

Gothic Art Book Shop, 127-2nd Ave., near 12th St.
Maise's Book Store, 424 Grand St., cor. Attorney.
Epstein's Drug Store, 1674 Madison Ave., near 110th St.
M. Stern's Jewelry Store, 1337 Wilkins Ave., Bronx.
Katz's Drug Store, 78 Graham Ave., Williamsburg.
Neidorf's Book Store, 1817 Pitkin Ave., Brownsville.
or by mail and in person at offices of

The League for Public Discussion

500 Fifth Ave., New York Longacre 10435-6384

International Relations Section

Justice in the Field

By HENRY LONGAN STUART

FRANCE provides rich soil for the foreigner with a faculty for moral indignation but nonetheless a strange equilibrium of judgment has always existed, an equilibrium which may be unstable but which shows no present sign of collapsing, far less of turning into such adverse judgment as overwhelmed her neighbor on the east. How does France save herself? Is it by making reprobation, as she makes alimentation, a domestic affair? French reactions to injustice are instinctive and, on the whole, to be trusted. The "j'accuse" industry is self-supported. Any time there is a Dreyfus you can rely on a Zola or Labori. Where there is a General Headquarters, a Pierre-feu or Barbusse is not far away. In France "now-it-can-be-told" really means "now it will all be told."

A little brochure just reprinted by the Association Républicaine des Anciens Combattants, with a preface from the pen of the author of "Le Feu," is a case in point. As a sidelight on war-time psychology it seems worthy of notice before it passes into the limbo from which the historian of the future will have to disinter it. The pamphlet is a record of fourteen executions on the Western front, summarily inflicted by French soldiers on French soldiers, singly or en masse. The legality of all is dubious even according to the Draconian war code. To some of them the crowning joke of "rehabilitation," not to say the conferring of military decorations on the victims, has since been appended.

Take the case of the "affair of the Ravin de Fleury," which has a faintly reminiscent flavor. Probably owing to the fact that the two victims were of commissioned rank, the case was guardedly commented upon in military circles in Paris even before the armistice. Its sober presentment by Marianne Rauze now does not disturb an impression that the two lieutenants, Herduin and Milan, died as the result of a particularly inhuman interpretation of orders.

Both officers were company commanders in the 347th Regiment of Infantry, part of the 103rd Brigade, which, it appears, was sent into the front line near Thiaumont on June 3, 1916, with orders to occupy their sector until relieved on the 10th by the 49th Chasseurs à Pied. During the night of the 7th an unusually severe bombardment was opened on them, in the course of which communication with the right was cut off. The bombardment was a prelude to an attack the following day delivered by an entire German division. At the end of a hard day's fighting the colonel commanding the brigade had been killed, the battalion commandant taken prisoner, and the unit which the unfortunate officers commanded reduced to nineteen men. At eight o'clock Sub-Lieutenant Piol, wounded and sent to the rear, could write his wife: "It is eight. I am wounded and evacuated. Herduin is still fighting." By the time darkness had fallen, the French artillery, confident the trench had been captured, was bombarding it briskly from the rear, and German machine-guns were enfilading it on the right. Upon these two young men, neither of them professional soldiers, fell the responsibility of deciding whether to surrender, remain until the unit, now swollen by refugees to forty-one men, was annihilated, or to retreat, by the only line still open, upon Verdun and Fleury. The command, it may be mentioned, had not been rationed for four days. A letter written by Herduin to his wife before the tragedy establishes this. Herduin decided for retreat. Before taking what was to prove a fatal decision, he got a message through to the colonel of the 293rd Infantry on his right, asking for instructions. By this officer he was provided with a sauf-conduit to Verdun.

The two officers, legitimately proud of having extricated their command, arrived at Fleury on the morning of June 11. They were met by Captain Delruelle, bearer of a letter from the higher command, which had apparently been given him sealed. Herduin and Milan were to be shot immediately. To letters of protest from all three officers arrived the laconic answer, "No observations. Immediate execution." Six hours later the two men who had held an isolated post for two days fell dead under the bullets of their own men. The execution was not only inhuman but absolutely illegal. A circular is in existence, dated April 29, 1916 (it is quoted by Marianne Rauze), calling the attention of general officers in the field to the abolition by previous decree of "courts martial" and the substitution of "conseils de guerre," one on each division, at which the accused are in all cases to be represented by counsel.

Supported by the justice of her cause, Mme Herduin undertook the rehabilitation of her martyred husband. The successive answers that reached her are worth quoting:

1. No right to a pension exists, Sub-Lieutenant Herduin having neither been killed in action nor died of wounds.
2. The corps archives do not permit of any details being given as to the nature of Sub-Lieutenant Herduin's death.
3. I have the honor to inform you that no record exists of any sentence upon your late husband.

Herduin, in short, cannot be rehabilitated because he has never legally been executed. Infinite are the resources of bureaucracy! A pension, it is true, was finally accorded to the stubborn widow.

"If we go forward we die; if we go back we die. It is best to go forward and die." Early in September, 1917, eight soldiers of the 327th Infantry had reason, for a few agonized hours, to appreciate the truth of the old Ashanti battle chant. In the thick of the retreat from Belgium they found themselves cut off from their comrades, who had fallen back "two or three hundred meters" in some disorder and under heavy fire, upon the 270th Regiment. The duty of so small a unit, isolated in the face of an advancing enemy, is nowhere clearly laid down. That the situation offers an opportunity for self-sacrifice cannot be denied. Nevertheless, it is a pardonable instinct with the average soldier to gravitate toward the direction in which he knows the headquarters of his corps have betaken themselves. The little group were seeking this when they had the misfortune to encounter a certain General Baudougourd. To a brief question they replied that they had heard the "sauve qui peut" and were falling back on the 270th. "Stay here, and I will go back with you," was the cold reply. Seven of the eight obeyed. The eighth, who owed his life to his disobedience, proceeded to rejoin his unit. He does not appear ever to have been molested for so doing. The others, more docile, stayed with their general and accompanied him to the rear during the night when the final retreat was operated. Their reveille next morning was a tragic one. An order for the immediate execution of all seven was delivered at six o'clock. Says Marcel Daniel in his report of the incident:

The officers commanding these unfortunate men, including Colonel Verzat, and their commandant, Richard d'Yvry, vainly besought mercy for the seven victims, who had on several occasions shown marked courage and coolness in action. They saw the general three times, exposing the iniquity, injustice, and contempt for human life contained in such an order. Their efforts were useless.

"Put us in the front line, but, for pity's sake, don't let us fall under French bullets!" cried Delsarte, one of the doomed men, when ordered for execution. The firing squad, composed, contrary to custom, of men from another corps, fired without taking aim. Two of the victims escaped immediate death. One, named Barbieux, died in an ambulance three days later. Another, Wattrelot, was allowed to rejoin his regiment after relating the affair to an officer who picked him up. Before falling eventually at Hebuterne he had received two citations for valor and the military medal.

During the bitter month of February, 1915, the imminence of danger (he was a member of the 60th Infantry, on duty at Belfort) seems to have affected Private Bercot less than the fragility of his trousers. In France to this day, when seams rip, buttons fly off at their first contact with button-holes, people shrug their shoulders and comment: article de guerre. Bercot's breeches were war articles of the first order.

In the French, as in other armies, a private soldier has a perfect right to carry legitimate complaints "higher up." But military authorities (and not in France alone) are apt to look with a jaundiced eye upon too literal an interpretation of the prerogative. Bercot made one reclamation for new trousers without result. A second met with no better fate. His journey to the front lines seems to have been largely punctuated with reclamations, all having reference to the unsatisfactory character of those important garments. At last, on February 11, a pair of trousers is supplied him. They have been just stripped from a corpse of some days' maturity and are stiff with blood. Details included in the frank French text must be omitted in English. Bercot refused to don the gruesome relic. Lieutenant Audie flourished a military manual in his face, and, that there might be no mistake, drew his attention to a line reading: "Refusal to obey in the presence of the enemy. Penalty: Death." Bercot laughed—the frank, hearty laugh of the French peasant faced with an incongruity. "Death! . . . A pair of pantaloons!" He was still laughing when a squad, with fixed bayonets, formed on his left and right. "About—march!" A court martial had been hastily assembled in a room of the Château de Fontenay. Within twelve hours Bercot is as dead as the comrade at whose bloodstained trousers his gorge had risen.

One is tempted to close "Les Crimes des Conseils de Guerre" with a sense of bitterness and even a little hate. Yet, as always, that strange suspension of judgment intervenes. If the crimes it chronicles were committed by Frenchmen on Frenchmen, no less French is their fearless exposure. The portent remains a portent when every allowance has been made for inaccuracy, class hatred, and exaggeration of rumor. Publication of such a book would be impossible in any country where belief in freedom of speech was not an article of faith. Mohammedans refrain from destroying any scrap of writing for fear the name of Allah, hidden somewhere in the script, should perish with it. The French seem to have the same scruple where suppression of the printed word is in question. Somewhere or other, their history tells them, truth may lurk.

The Present Rulers of Germany

By BORIS STERN

THE year 1923 will go down in the history of Germany as a year of terrible hardship and bitter disillusionment, not only for the "working class," but also for the major part of the intellectual and middle classes. Whatever comfort and subsistence were left them by the inflation were taken away by the unemployment of a third of the industrial workers of the nation. But how did the agricultural class and the larger industrialists fare?

Since the war, and especially during the last year or two, the agricultural class in Germany has been growing stupendously rich. The rapid depreciation of the mark affected some of the more ignorant farmers unfavorably, because they could not easily rid themselves of the notion that "money" was "money," to be hoarded, but in time they too learned the worthlessness of the paper mark, and refused to have anything to do with it. The simplest method, of course, to avoid the law which made it compulsory to accept paper marks as a means of payment was to cease going to the city entirely and keep their products to themselves. The tales of the larger cities being absolutely without butter, milk, eggs, and other produce, while the farmers fed them to their pigs, are not legends but actual facts. And when a farmer brought something to the city he asked prices that sounded strange even to the ear of a German. One farmer arrived at a public market with two dozen eggs. When approached by eager women he nonchalantly announced: "One trillion apiece"—this at a time when the official rate of the dollar was 2.52 trillion marks, making his price about 40 cents for one egg. In his case the eggs were never sold; and only the police saved him from being lynched.

Since the introduction of the new gold-mark taxes the farmers have complained that they could not pay without being completely ruined. While in the office of a famous Berlin lawyer, an expert on taxation, I heard one of his farmer clients say that he could see no way whatsoever of raising the necessary cash for the tax. A few questions revealed the following situation. Prior to the war he was quite poor, with his land under mortgage. Now he has no more debts, as he paid off his mortgage with a sum which was even less than the fare he paid to get to the place of payment; he has built himself a spacious house, has improved the land, has bought machinery and increased his stock, although he has not enough liquid funds to pay the tax. As it is still impossible to borrow money for long terms except at exceedingly high interest rates and with clauses guaranteeing against losses from depreciation, the only means of payment left to the farmer was to sell some of his stock or other tangible goods—hence the cry of ruin. On the whole the farmers, small or large, thrived under inflation and today form the strongest and most reactionary group in Germany.

The problem of the industrial group in Germany is more complicated. Aside from the buildings here and there added to their plants, there is little tangible evidence of prosperity. Still less can be found in the market value of their stocks, because of the hopeless tangle of gold-mark and paper-mark capitalization. But there are economic facts and incidents which cannot be camouflaged behind figures and which reveal how enormously this small group has profited.

Inflation at first brings with it, as a rule, high industrial activity. At no time was French industry so active as during the months of the falling franc. In the first stages of inflation the country seems actually to enjoy a period of prosperity. There is much buying and selling, a high rate of production, and little or no unemployment. Orders come in from foreign countries, which for a time at least are at a disadvantage in competing with a country which has a depreciating currency. Our Fordney-McCumber tariff was urged in part because of the underselling of American commodities by Germany, made possible by the fall of the mark in 1921 and 1922. But the working population and the middle class whose incomes are more or less permanently fixed suffer the consequences of inflation almost from the very start, and a country as a whole can hardly be called prosperous under such abnormal conditions.

In a country with a depreciated currency, however, prices lag behind the exchange, and the amount to be paid, by the time an order is completed, has lost much of its real value. These facts make it profitable for foreigners to buy in a country of a depreciating currency, but the entrepreneur can see to it that they do not cut into his profits. Wages, which still constitute the largest single element in the cost of production, and the raw materials purchased at home usually lag even further behind the exchange than does the price of the finished product; the difference in the lag goes to the producer in the form of profit. And a depreciation premium may be put upon the price beforehand, or the agreement may be made in terms of a stable foreign currency, or the papers could be discounted with a bank which, like the German Reichsbank, kept a rate of discount at 19 per cent per annum even at a time when the weekly depreciation of the mark was more than 100 per cent. German industrialists used all of the methods above mentioned: gold-mark contracts were introduced by the larger firms even before there was any danger that the mark would never recover, while it is well known that the 19 per cent discount policy of the Reichsbank was the chief cause of the fabulously growing wealth of the late Hugo Stinnes.

There were other sources of profits. In spite of the agreements with the trade unions to pay wages and salaries at least once a week, and later, as the fall of the mark became more and more accelerated, twice a week, this was seldom carried out. The easiest way to postpone the payment was to explain the lack of cash on hand by the failure of the banks to supply the necessary amounts of paper money. Hence, although the records were made out regularly once or twice a week, the actual payment of the wages took place three or four days, and at times a whole week, after the records were made, and no consideration was given to the change in the value of the mark during the interval. That the employers, however, were conscious of the gains will be seen from the following incident.

B. is a large locomotive plant located in a suburb of Berlin, employing about 6,000 wage workers and salaried employees. From October 15 the latter were supposed to receive 50 per cent of their salaries in the newly issued stable money, Goldanleihe and Dollarschatzanweisungen, which the Government issued in denominations of $5, $2, $1, and fractions of a dollar, guaranteed by the sum total of real U. S. dollars kept in the Reichsbank. (These were still in circulation in Germany in March.) The records of the salaries for the last two weeks in October were made out on October 30, when the dollar stood at 65 billion marks, and reckoned at this rate the envelopes called for a certain number of dollars each. The payment, however, was made on November 1, when the dollar already stood at 130 billion marks, and the workers were astounded to find in their envelopes exactly half of the number of dollars the records called for. The works council of the plant called a general meeting of all the salaried employees, and one member openly accused the firm of stealing half of the workers' money. A representative of the firm present at the meeting declared that no money has ever been taken out of the envelopes, but that it had long been the policy of the management when paying in stable currency (German or foreign) to pay at the rate of the day the payment was executed, and that this policy had now been applied to the workers also. Not a word was said about the previous payments in paper money at a rate less than half of the value of the mark on the day the payment was due.

Another source of big profits to the industrial group was the payment of government bills presented on the first of the month for services rendered during the previous month. This includes the post, the telephone and telegraph, and the railroads, which still belong to the Government. The Government allowed ten days of grace for payment. Just a few lines of simple arithmetic: On October 1 the dollar was worth 242 million marks; on October 10 it was worth 2.975 millions. Who obtained the difference?

The German industrial magnates paid small taxes to the Government for similar reasons. The time allowed between the fixing of the tax and its collection was sufficient to render the sum collected to fall to a mere fraction of the amount intended. Even more preposterous were the profits the employing class made from the taxes collected from their employees. All employees in Germany are required to pay a tax amounting to 10 per cent of their earnings, and this is collected at the source of income. The employers were authorized to deduct 10 per cent of the earnings of their employees every week or every month, but they turned it over to the Government only four times a year, when they paid their own taxes!

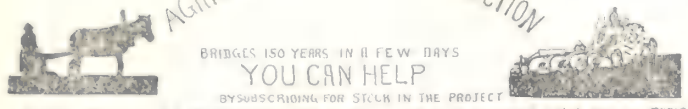

To conceal their profits which in spite of the juggling done in the capitalization by mixing together gold and paper mark accounts reached at times staggering figures, the employers were forced to resort to all kinds of subterfuges, of which the following is a very interesting sample.

The huge electrical plant which is an important part of the Stinnes trust kept its works running at full capacity, often even with overtime, all last autumn and winter. Every attempt of the workers to raise wages was, however, met with the argument that the plant was working at a loss. The management said it was forced to accept orders at prices which were not sufficient to cover the current expenses, and made the contracts only in order to provide work for their employees and not to let the costly machinery stand idle. The same arguments were used with the Government in order to cut down the taxes. The chairman of the works council of the plant, who is at the same time the representative of the workers at the company's board of directors and as such entitled to access to the contracts of the firm, however, was struck by the fact that the majority of the contracts were made with a few companies located in Switzerland and in Holland, and that the prices made to these companies were lower than for other orders. His further inquiries revealed these to be a part of the electric concern in Berlin, operating as independent units. The commodities were forwarded to them at ridiculously low prices, and they in turn sold them at the usual foreign-market prices, retaining the difference outside of Germany. The method was devised to kill three birds with the same stone: to keep wages down, to cheat the Government out of taxes due and to agitate for still lower taxes, and, finally, to send its capital out of Germany to keep it secure in foreign banks.

But inflation, like everything else, came to an end, and the industrial group realized that with worn-out and antiquated machinery it would no longer be in a position to compete with foreign producers. Before investing new capital and making radical changes the employers wanted to clean the field and settle with labor. Wages were indeed already down to the barest minimum, but the eight-hour day conceded on November 15, 1918, remained. The ground was well prepared by propaganda in the press, and the Government aided, but the trade unions which during the worst days of inflation had lost almost all their funds, their press, and much of their membership, presented an unexpectedly stiff front. The eight-hour day was lost, however, although the unions were saved. The employers are for the present masters, and are not afraid to show it.

MEDIEVAL MODERN

AGRICULTURAL-RECONSTRUCTION

BRIDGES 150 YEARS IN A FEW DAYS
YOU CAN HELP
BY SUBSCRIBING FOR STOCK IN THE PROJECT
FOLLOW RELIEF WITH CONSTRUCTIVE AGRICULTURAL WORK ORGANIZED ON A PAYING BASIS
WRITE TO HAROLD M. WINE

UKRAINE FARMING & MACHINERY CORPORATION
353 WEST 22nd St.
NEW YORK CITY

GEORGE STROBEL	JEANIE WALSH	EUGENE SCHOEN	HAROLD M. WINE	FRANK P. WALSH
PRESIDENT	VICE PRESIDENT	SECRETARY	MANAGING DIRECTOR	GENERAL COUNSEL

The old concept of Russia's 120 million Peasants must be abandoned. War and Famine have swept away half of his draft animals, much of his old equipment and most of the old hindrances to new ideas, but have left him his pre-war heritage of primitive agriculture and poverty.

To meet their hunger for Agricultural Reconstruction, a practical method has been developed by Americans who gained their knowledge of the peasant and Russian conditions by actual contact, working large tractor farms under the auspices of several American Relief Organizations. They have secured the Official assurance of Russian Government Departments of the use of 10,000 acres of the famous black, fertile soil in the UKRAINE. This land is to be cultivated and organized as a demonstration farm-school, using American methods and machinery.

We hope you will join with well-known students of Russian conditions by subscribing to either Preferred or Common stock and by introducing the project to any friends who may be in sympathy with this practical method of Russian Reconstruction.

Newton or Einstein?

EINSTEIN'S Theory of Relativity counter to Newton's Law of Gravitation does not seem to have been borne out by facts observed in a recent eclipse. Scientific and lay minds are divided.

Is Einstein wrong? Charles Lane Poor, Professor of Celestial Mechanics at Columbia, points out the errors of Einstein in the June issue of

THE FORUM

Edited by HENRY GODDARD LEACH

This is the negative side of a debate which is completed in the July Number with "The Triumphs of Einstein," by Archibald Henderson, Professor of Mathematics in The University of North Carolina, who, fresh from a personal interview with the German scientist, begins by saying with emphasis, "There are no errors of Einstein."

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF DOSTOEVSKI

A series of intimate letters published in three instalments, with explanatory notes by Princess C. Radziwill, daughter of General Rzewuski. The author is revealed in characteristic moods of exaltation, dejection, and prophetic inspiration.

GERMANY TODAY,

by Ira Nelson Morris

The former Minister to Sweden gives a first-hand summary of Germany's present problems and impediments.

FILMS IN DARTMOOR PRISON

by Stacy Aumonier

An historic English jail makes an experiment in the spirit of the times.

TWO GATES TO ONE FAITH

by Walter Russell Bowie

The Rector of Grace Church, New York, goes beneath the surface of the religious controversy.

DECLARATION VS. CONSTITUTION

by A. Washington Pezet

The second article in a series on the reconstruction of politics.

THOMAS HARDY IN A NEW ROLE

by Archibald Henderson

Written after a visit to the premiere of Mr. Hardy's latest play.

PIRANDELLO'S WARNING

by Alice Rohe

The Italian playwright liked America, but—

All News stands 35 cents the copy, or Five Issues for One Dollar. Send the Coupon.

If you demand fundamentals, the best comment and authoritative information on the thought of the day, if you enjoy humor that is subtle, fiction that is not always pathological, if you long to read works that are distinctive, original, which possess rare literary quality, then THE FORUM is the magazine for you.

Fill in, tear off, and mail the Coupon now

THE FORUM, 247 Park Ave., New York

Enter my subscription for five months, beginning with the June issue. I enclose $1.00 (Foreign $1.30).

Name

Address

City

State

N 5-28

Contributors to This Issue

BERTHA WALLERSTEIN has contributed articles to various publications.

FLOYD DELL is the author of several novels and collections of essays. His latest book, "Looking at Life," has just been published.

MAXWELL BODENHEIM, who with Ben Hecht edits the Chicago Literary Times, has published five volumes of verse and two novels.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL is an American journalist now in Europe. He contributed an article, The New Irish Crisis, to The Nation for April 16.

HENRY LONGAN STUART is a British journalist who wrote An Englishman's View of the United States in the volume "Civilization in the United States."

MONTE CARLO STATIONERY 200 Sheets $2.00 100 Envelopes

Your name and address or monogram embossed in distinctive raised letters on 200 single sheets (100 marked—100 plain) or 100 double sheets 5% x 8%, and 100 square envelopes, $2 prepaid. Paper white, gray, blue, buff; embossing gold, maroon, blue, black, jade green. Print plainly and state colors desired. If inconvenient to remit with order will send C.O.D. $2.25. Comparison invited. Samples submitted free.

DE LUXE STATIONERY CO., 344N West 52nd St., New York

THE PEOPLE'S MARX Abridged popular edition of the Three Volumes of Karl Marx's CAPITAL, re-arranged for beginners. Over 120,000 words, strong paper cover, price 75 cents postpaid. THE COMMUNIST MANIFESTO and Marx's THE CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE have now for the first time been issued in one cloth-bound volume, 60 cents. New 10c editions of Fisher's EVOLUTION AND REVOLUTION and Pannekoek's MARXISM AND DARWINISM have just been printed. All four books and a catalog sent by insured mail on receipt of $1.45. Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

Ingersoll

Reliable Watches at Low Prices

Models $2 to $10

IF you want breezes this summer and sunlight, come to see our seven outside rooms facing North, East and South on the 11th floor. If you want books and quiet in charming surroundings, you will find them also. Linen, silver and a piano. About six blocks South of Columbia University. And it is yours from June 1st to Sept. 15th for $125 a month. Phone: Academy 4055 or address Box No. 220, care The Nation.

EDUCATED young Canadian woman wishes employment giving opportunity for travel in the West or in Europe. Small remuneration accepted. Secretarial experience. Fond of outdoor work. Box 218, c/o The Nation.

YOUNG LADY—intelligent, cultured, capable, desires position where she can use her common sense as secretary, correspondent, bookkeeper. 12 years' experience. References. Decatur 4050.

SPEAKERS: We assist in preparing special articles, papers, speeches, debates. Expert scholarly service. AUTHORS RESEARCH BUREAU, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

CAMP UTOPIA
Lake Ellis — Wingdale, N. Y.
A Vacation Ground for Grown-Ups
in the Berkshire Hills
120 minutes from Grand Central
Make reservations now for Decoration Day Week-end.
WM. J. PERLMAN & DR. WILL DURANT
Managing Director Associate Director
Address 2000 Broadway, New York City
Telephone Columbus 2454 or Bensonhurst 0759

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N. Y.
A Camp for Adults
IN THE BERKSHIRES
Less than 3 hours ride from New York
OPEN FOR DECORATION DAY
TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.
Rates $30 per Week—$6 per day
Address D. LEIKIN, 1056 Hoe Avenue, Bronx N. Y.
Tel. Intervale 2667

A BEAUTIFUL PLACE IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS
FOR A WEEK-END or an EXTENDED VISIT
5th SEASON
Rates $7 a day and $37.50 a week. Address
E. G. Ohmer, Western View Farm, New Milford, Connecticut, 2½ hours from New York.
Telephone New Milford 163—Ring 2.

THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.
LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One System, Universal Service

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

Midol

headache
toothache neuralgia

Does not affect the heart

Non habit forming

General Drug Co.

94 N. Moore St., New York

Cooperative Apartments

Group erecting elevator apartments on Andrews Avenue, block south of New York University

Children's Playground—Tennis Court—Permanent South, East and West exposures

Subscriptions invited

Investment $475 per room. Rental $16 per room covers all expenses and 10% return on investment. Net average rental $14.25 per room. Paul Braude, 299 Madison Avenue. Vanderbilt 9431.

A YOUNG MAN of twenty-seven, whose literary work has appeared in various periodicals and anthologies, and who has experience in preparing publicity and advertising copy, wishes to give up his present position (which is of a commercial nature) and would like a connection, either part-time or full-time, where he could find full scope for his training and abilities in a more congenial and stimulating work. Address: Box 219, care of The Nation.

GERMAN BOOKS NEW and OLD Large Representative Stock at BEYER'S BOOKSHOP
207 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK
Opp. Terminal, Upstairs

SEXOLOGY Complete descriptive international catalog of Sex Books sent to adult readers. Special catalog of Advanced Sex Books for members of Professions. Send 10c postage for International catalog.

THE BOOK LEAGUE Desk N. 47 West 42d Street New York City

THAT BOOK YOU WANT!
We hold an enormous stock, Second-hand and New, all subjects. On approval. Also Rare Books. Catalogues free, mention interests. Commissions executed. FOYLES, 121 Charing Cross Road, London, England.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 1924

No. 3074

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	625
EDITORIALS:
The Case for "Al" Smith	628
Government by Blackmail	629
America and the Dawes Plan	629
Biography Made to Order	630
I RETURN TO AMERICA. By Sinclair Lewis	631
HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE COAL FIELDS—A DEBATE. By "An Operator" and Winthrop D. Lane	633
THE CONGRESSIONAL SWAN SONG. By William Hard	637
THE CHURCH AND WAR. By Glenn Frank	638
LEFT AND RIGHT IN THE NEEDLE-TRADES UNIONS. By Nathan Fine	639
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	640
CORRESPONDENCE	641
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Gandhi of the Balkans. By Emil Lengyel	642
The Russian Unions Defend the Revolution	643
SUMMER BOOK SECTION
POEMS BY CARL SANDBURG	645
HARRY HANSEN: REVIEWER OF BOOKS. By Harry Hansen	646
EPITAPH. By Arthur Guiterman	647
THE TWO-EDGED SWORD. By Genevieve Taggard	648
BOOKS:
The Way of an Eagle. By Philip Guedalla	649
Shelley. By Ludwig Lewisohn	649
A Business Man's Utopia. By Stuart Chase	650
Much Ado About Nothing. By Kathleen Millay	651
Ignatius Loyola. By Charles H. A. Wager	652
Economics of the Madhouse. By Henry Raymond Mussey	652
Olive Schreiner. By Ruth S. Alexander	653
Samuel Pepys. By Mark Van Doren	654
A Tragic Theme. By Grace Frank	655
The American Revolution. By Clarence W. Alvord	655
Chekhov. By Johan J. Smertenko	656
New Light on Ancient Egypt. By E. G. H. Kraeling	657
Roland and Gandhi. By Lucien Price	658
Scoundrels and Heroes. By Charles J. Finger	659
American Documents. By Everts B. Greene	660
The Art of Singing. By Henrietta Straus	661
Books in Brief	662
DRAMA:
All God's Chillun. By Ludwig Lewisohn	664

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY
MANAGING EDITOR

IRITA VAN DOREN
LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE
ROBERT HERRICK

JOHN A. HOBSON
H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS
CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE BATTLE OF THE FRANC continues, and as in the World War American finance plays the decisive role. The franc was worth eight cents when Poincaré marched into the Ruhr; it fell, almost steadily, through the first fourteen months of that occupation until on March 8, 1924, it reached its bottom level of 3.42 cents. Then came the American intervention. J. P. Morgan and Co., acting with other international bankers, opened a $100,000,000 credit to the Bank of France. It was a violent stimulant; the franc leaped upward. Millions must have been made by those on the inside; millions were lost by those who were caught short. Within six weeks the franc virtually doubled in value, touching 6.64 on May 6, just before the French elections. This was an enormous relief to the French consumer, for commodity prices, which had been rising, began to fall. By this action (together with the Dawes Report, which offered a new prospect of relief when the Ruhr policy had proved a failure) American finance probably saved Poincaré from utter rout in the election of May 11.

THE LIBERALS WON that election, although not overwhelmingly. On the day on which the electoral results were announced the franc dropped 46 points, and it continued dropping until, on May 20, it touched 5.24½. Then Premier Poincaré and his Finance Minister, together with the President, M. Millerand, took the extraordinary step of inviting Edouard Herriot and Paul Painlevé, the probable leaders of the next Ministry, to a conference on the financial situation. After the meeting a communiqué was issued, stating that "MM. Painlevé and Herriot declared their convictions that a rigorous equilibrium of the budget was an essential policy of any Government." The newspapers have hinted that the conference was prompted by the bankers, who had made their loan on condition that the budget be balanced and stringent taxes collected. The gloved hand of Wall Street was intervening to force the Liberals in France to follow the financial policy imposed upon their predecessors. While the franc was rising, a French rumor reports, the Bank of France not only regained every cent of the loan which had been thrown upon the market but made a clear profit of $45,000,000; in checking the new drop it lost $55,000,000. At any rate, whatever rumors and suspicions prove true or untrue, the drop has, for the present, stopped. But can it be permanently checked even with the aid of American finance? That will depend upon measures yet to be taken. Loans are only a sort of stimulant; unless France revises her fiscal and foreign policies the franc will fall lower than ever.

THE FISH BILL for the relief of German women and children having been smothered in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by those three noble liberals and priceless humanitarians, Lodge, Wadsworth, and Pepper, after having been voted by the House, a new bill, Senate Bill 3262, has been introduced by Senator Howell authorizing a fifty-year loan of $25,000,000, free of interest for the first ten years. All the money is to be spent in this country to the advantage of the American farmer. Such a bill ought to go through overnight if only for the sake of our agriculturists. It, too, has been referred to Senator Lodge's committee. Nothing but a clear-cut expression of public opinion will move these "hard-boiled" men. Once more we urge our readers to write to these Senators and to Mr. Howell, or directly to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The generosity and kindliness of America ought to drive this bill through before Congress adjourns.

THE TAX BILL HAS BEEN PASSED, and as we go to press the President is making up his mind whether to accept or reject it. We are willing to wager an automobile against a feather-duster that it will win the President's signature as easily as did the immigration bill, that Secretary Mellon will no more resign than did Secretary Hughes, and that, the great tax hocus-pocus over, all will go on as before. We have never been able to get excited about this tax struggle because we could not see that any principle was involved or any scientific tax-drafting. It has been the usual playing of politics, with Mr. Mellon seeking to favor the very wealthy, from whom his party draws its sinews of war. Mr. Mellon's own abysmal ignorance of sound finance Mr. Mussey demonstrated in last week's Nation. That a good deal of the furor created in behalf of his plan—never was there more elaborate or more expensive propaganda for a measure pending before Congress—was bogus appears from the press dispatches when the compromise bill finally passed the House. The final obsequies of the Mellon bill, so the correspondents report, "were marked by no genuine effort to defend the discarded plan of the Treasury chief." Why should there have been? The whole procedure has been a humbug. Did not President Coolidge repeatedly let it be known he would never, never, never sign any bill but Mellon's? And will he not sign on the dotted line now? Even the Treasury assertions that the new bill and the bonus will result in a huge deficit next year are exploded. Washington now looks for a small surplus.

THE PRESIDENT'S SIGNATURE to the abominable immigration bill does not surprise us. A Grover Cleveland would have sent it back with a message to stir the country. Instead, Mr. Coolidge utters this incredible nonsense:

I gladly recognize that the enactment of this provision does not imply any change in our sentiment of admiration and cordial friendship for the Japanese people, a sentiment which has had and will continue to have abundant manifestation.

Then he declares that he would have vetoed the exclusion provision had it been embodied in a separate bill. At the same time he says "there is scarcely any ground for disagreement as to the result we want, but this method of securing it is unnecessary and deplorable at this time. . . ." Was there ever more muddle-headedness, or a baser attempt to straddle an issue, or a more obvious attempt to bamboozle a people? Even the argument that he must sign the bill because there must be some general immigration legislation falls to the ground. A man of real force and courage would have sent this bill back and, if it were not passed over his veto, would have kept Congress in session until it passed a decent measure. As it is, the bill strikes a deadly blow at the peace of the Pacific, imperils many of the gains of the Washington Conference, insults needlessly a proud, high-spirited people, and provides the excuse for a league of yellow peoples against the whites. The natural step now would be the withdrawal of every American missionary from China and Japan. For them to remain there would stamp us as guilty of the basest hypocrisy. "Love thy neighbor as thyself." Yes, but don't let him come near you!

ONCE MORE OUR MILITARISTS are at work. Admiral Fisk calls on America to make a religion of preparedness. Secretary Wilbur gives us the shocking news that we are inferior to Great Britain in our naval strength as permitted by the Washington naval treaty, just as if we had not been inferior to Great Britain in our navy from the day of the birth of the republic until this hour. Every effort is to be made to drive a bill through Congress to waste $150,000,000 on eight new scout cruisers, six river gunboats, and the modernization of six battleships. At the very moment that some of our greatest church bodies are crying out at the very thought of war—the Presbyterians demanding its outlawry—the Government is to go on pouring out public funds for a "defense" that is as foolish as it is war-provoking. This is the time for President Coolidge to call the disarmament conference which Congress is urging and which the British Government has declared for on condition that the United States will take the lead. It is not only a disarmament conference that we need. If President Coolidge desires to immortalize himself he will demand without loss of time a conference of the nations for the permanent outlawry of war by all civilized peoples.

A REDUCTION BY NINE-TENTHS in the size and activities of the Bureau of Investigation of the United States Department of Justice is recommended by John W. H. Crim, who was an agent in that service a good many years ago. Later he became an assistant to the Attorney General, resigning last December after two years in office. In a statement to the Senate committee which is investigating the Department of Justice Mr. Crim said that the Bureau of Investigation had been built from a small body of special agents, working under various United States attorneys, into a big service directed from Washington, costing the Government two and a half million dollars a year. It was expanded especially during the war and was made up largely of doubtful political appointees who, armed with a commission from the United States Government, had become a source of danger and corruption. Everything that we have learned about the bureau in recent years bears out this judgment. Palmer and Daugherty degraded the service into one for political propaganda, persecution, and espionage. The bureau's scares over phantom reds are notorious; more recently it has been discovered in the systematic practice of trying to head off investigation and prosecution by blackmail. It ought to be drastically cut down and limited to the strictly legal inquiries for which it was created.

ELBERT H. GARY'S boast that the steel industry prevented its nationalization during the war by threatening not to play if this were done has brought forth some plain speaking that he probably did not foresee. Mr. Gary said at a dinner of the American Iron and Steel Institute that when the War Industries Board suggested that the Government might have to take over the industry the reply was made: "You will never do it with the consent or approval of the owners of these properties, and you will be held responsible, morally at least." The issue was then laid before President Wilson, Mr. Gary said, and nothing more was heard of nationalization. To this Bernard M. Baruch, who was chairman of the War Industries Board, has replied in effect that the steel industry was engaged in such outrageous profiteering at the time America entered the European struggle, and showed so little willingness to subordinate profits to patriotism, that it was necessary to consider nationalization. One of the Allies had been charged 14 cents a pound for ship plates, and 4½ cents was demanded of the United States. The Government's technicians thought even the latter price much too high, and after nationalization of the industry had been broached this figure was finally reduced by about one-third. Apparently Mr. Baruch's contact with American business during the war left him with some doubt that making the world safe for democracy was its unique aim, for he reached the conclusion that if such an emergency arose again "money and materials" ought to be conscripted as well as men.

HOW NOT TO TREAT the immigrant was illustrated in a New York City police court the other day when a Greek was fined $10 for sweeping rubbish into the street in front of a restaurant where he was employed. Presumably he was acting under instructions from his employer, who should have been the man to be arrested and fined, but assuming the punishment to be merited, one finds it impossible to swallow the gratuitous and absurd statement with which Magistrate George W. Simpson accompanied the fine. Learning that the Greek had been here five years without taking steps to become an American citizen His Honor remarked: "Any man who doesn't take out his first papers after one year should be sent back where he came from." Likewise, of course, Americans working for the Standard Oil Company in Colombia or for the United Fruit Company in Honduras who do not take steps to become Colombians or Hondurans within a year should be deported, while American missionaries in Turkey and newspaper correspondents in Germany who do not similarly decide to be Turks or Germans should be sent home by the first boat. While we are at the job of restricting the courts, ought we not to try to limit judicial twaddle?

DO AMERICANS any longer believe in the death penalty? Of the first 250 talesmen examined in order to select a jury for a murder case in Staten Island, New York, ninety-seven had to be excused because of their opposition to capital punishment in any circumstances. When sentiment in any community manifests itself so strongly against the enforcement of ancient standards it creates an important practical obstacle to the administration of justice which is worth considering along with the arguments in favor of eliminating the death penalty on other grounds. Not only are most of the best citizens now barred from acting as jurors in cases involving capital punishment, but many of those who serve have a subconscious revulsion to sending a fellow-man to his death that makes it difficult for them to vote for conviction even upon unimpeachable evidence. Many of the delays and miscarriages of justice of which we loudly complain are due to this cause. On the other hand, the innocent may well shudder at the prospect of intrusting their lives to a jury consisting solely of the thoughtless and the cruel. Are we to continue the death penalty until the only persons left to weigh the evidence in the most important of all judicial proceedings are savages or morons?

AMID TUMULTUOUS ENTHUSIASM, it is reported, the Methodist General Conference voted its anti-war resolutions. The glorification of war, these resolutions declare, must end; the cause of peace should be held dearer than party allegiance; the President should summon a new disarmament conference; the United States should enter the World Court; and a commission of twenty-five Methodists is to call a conference of the religious forces of the world to lead united Christianity in the fight against the evil of war. These are stirring words, after so many years in which religious conferences have dallied with discriminations between "good" wars and "bad" wars. The Presbyterians have, apparently, gone even further. A resolution pledging the Presbyterians to the "outlawing of war and to the hastening of the day when nations shall learn to war no more" passed the General Assembly unanimously, while an amendment promising "the full support of members of the church to the nation should the nation become involved in war" was "overwhelmingly defeated." Times are changing indeed.

BUT STRONGER RESOLUTIONS than these would seem natural if men read their New Testaments more thoughtfully. These resolutions are little more than the well-intentioned statements of peace principles which every Christian church adopted before the war drove them askew. The Methodist resolutions were indeed a refusal to face the war issue four-square, because they came before the General Conference as a compromise after the stalwart resolution recommended by the Committee on the State of the Church had excited opposition. The rejected resolution explicitly refused the support of the church to any war. Elsewhere in this issue we print a part of the stirring appeal which Mr. Glenn Frank made to the Methodists. The church, he sees, must refuse to bless any war; it cannot afford to shade its condemnation with "weasel" exceptions for "wars of defense" and "righteous wars." We agree with him; but it is difficult to understand how a man who takes his religion seriously can say that and then suggest that what the church cannot do the state may do, and that a nation may be dragged into a war without chance of escape. If we are ever to get anywhere in the war against war men must cease to distinguish between religious duty and civic duty.

THE STUDENTS of the University of Chicago have nominated Senator La Follette as their candidate for President. The students of Oberlin have nominated Borah and Pinchot for President and Vice-President, and have adopted a liberal platform, described in a letter on another page of this issue. The students of the huge freshman class in Contemporary Civilization at Columbia University have voted by large majorities for government ownership of railroads, nationalization of mines, equal rights for women, conservation, the League of Nations—and, by a smaller margin, for amending the Volstead Act. Thus little shoots of free thought bravely raise their heads in the unfertile fields of American education, where the process of exterminating mental vigor goes on unabated.

THE NEW STUDENT publishes a summary of recent faculty dismissals which show how the inquisition against freedom proceeds. In spite of protests and demonstrations of resentment on the part of the student body, Professor Nussbaum, head of the history department at Temple University, has been dismissed. President Conwell's private secretary admits that Mr. Nussbaum's political views are too liberal. Percy Marks of Brown University, author of "The Plastic Age," has been dismissed, not, we are assured, because he wrote that frank discussion of modern undergraduate behavior but because of "a growing divergence of taste and ideals" between himself and the rest of the college. Professor Bale of Parsons College, Fairfield, Iowa, has been dismissed. The reason has not been divulged, but his friends consider him "too live for the cemetery." Professors W. C. Casey and Watson Selva of James Milliken University at Decatur, Illinois, have been dismissed—and 400 students went on strike as a protest. It is something that there are men to speak their minds and risk their jobs; that the students are so far ahead of their governors is even more.

The Case for "Al" Smith

ALREADY the supporters of Governor Smith are claiming four hundred delegates for him in the Democratic National Convention. With each day they grow more confident of his nomination, not so much because of his own merits as because of the dearth of candidates and the necessity of concentrating on some one in order to defeat Mr. McAdoo. If Governor Cox had shown himself a brilliant and powerful personality, if John W. Davis were not politically unavailable, if Governor Sweet of Colorado were better known, if Senator Ralston were young—these ifs all play into Governor Smith's hands. Express your regret that he is so lacking in qualifications, in the breadth and stature hitherto deemed essential to the Presidency, and you are all but stumped by the question: "Well, if not 'Al,' who then?"

Let us then put the Governor under a friendly microscope. He is emphatically of and by the common people. Lincoln himself had no humbler origin. He is without pretense or affectation; he rejoices to pass for what he is. If his hat slips over one eye and his cigar tilts at an upward angle it is because he has always worn them thus, not a pose or desire to remind the masses that he is of them. Good humor, kindness, and honesty are stamped upon him. He rose through and by Tammany Hall, the most corrupt of political organizations, and has always played its loathsome politics, yet no one has ever questioned his personal rectitude. The Albany reporters who watched him hourly year in year out gave him their affection and their entire respect. Here, they said, is a man with real human feeling, not a mere self-seeking cynical politician. He means to do what is right and if he fails it is because he does not know how or is thwarted. This feeling about him has gone throughout his State. He can carry New York by big majorities because the bulk of the voters know that he is one of them and believe in his honesty and comparative unselfishness and hold him in real affection. They are not unaware that he still plays politics—"he has to"—but they are of the opinion that he knows what he is about and that he has sympathy for them. The adjective "great" is never applied to him; "Al" Smith is the name he goes by, and it is itself a demonstration of his democracy and of the affection in which he is held.

Turning from the man to his achievements, what has he accomplished and what are his political beliefs? He has given his State two good administrations; he has decreased both the direct State tax and the income tax. But there are no deep, far-reaching reforms to his credit, and it would be idle to assert that he has purified the atmosphere of Albany or placed the government where it ought to be. Governors come and governors go; the "system" remains triumphant. But he has decreased expenses and reduced taxes. What Mellon and Coolidge bungled so badly in Washington, Smith in New York did easily, Republicans aiding. As for a political philosophy, "Al" Smith would probably laugh if accused of having one—he might say he tried to serve the people. To this the hearer could add: "Without injuring Tammany Hall or in any way interfering with things as they are." Yet his outlook is liberal. He stood up for the rights of the Socialists in the Assembly when it seemed dangerous to do so. He believes in and has served free speech and free discussion; he released the State's political prisoners. He has a distinct sympathy for the under dog. He does not go back on the classes from which he came. Yet he is neither feared nor disliked by the masters of business. They feel that he is all right and the hall-mark of safety and sanity is put upon him by the approval of the New York Times. No timid capitalist lies awake nights in dread of "Al." Why should he?

That he has not achieved a reputation as a radical is a bit amusing. For in his 1920 annual message Governor Smith solemnly proposed nine socialistic laws. Had they come from a Morris Hillquit or Victor Berger the Times and Wall Street would have risen in their wrath. But no one felt alarmed that "Al" asked the Legislature to take steps toward socialization of the medical and nursing profession; for State ownership and operation of grain elevators after the North Dakota example; ownership and operation of public utilities; purchase and operation of all water-power, and—yes, it is true—to take State supervision of the production and distribution of the entire milk supply on the ground that the child is as much entitled to enough pure milk as to enough pure water. Few but The Nation's editors seem ever to have read that message; hence the wrath of the conservatives did not descend upon Governor Smith. True, he has gone on with his demand for the acquisition and operation of all water-power, but it has been easy to beat him at that. Much of the rest of his program has gone by the boards.

"Al" Smith as President? It is hard to visualize him in the White House. Not because he is both simple and plain. It would be a triumph of democracy were one to reach the highest office after overcoming such obstacles as have lain in his path. Not because he is a Catholic. Some day we hope to see a Catholic in the White House, if only to put an end to the attempt to limit men's political strivings on religious grounds, but to name a Catholic this year might strengthen the Ku Klux Klan and start a whispering campaign to prove that the Pope was taking possession of America. The electorate's attention should be concentrated upon economic and fiscal problems. To nominate a "wet" like Governor Smith would be to precipitate still another needless cause of contention. But these factors are not likely to count for or against the Governor; conventions are ruled not by delegates and rarely by public opinion. The die is cast by politicians gambling with their delegate pawns.

At this juncture the United States should have as its chief executive neither a Coolidge nor a Smith. The latter would have been a better President in a year like 1910 than a William H. Taft or a Benjamin Harrison. But the world has changed. The economic situation of the country is grave. A hundred intricate and difficult problems of finance and economics confront us. The political machine has everywhere broken down and the foreign relations of the United States have become all important. They should not be handled by one who is chiefly a good fellow. They call for a man of extraordinary vision, of widest sympathies, of deep knowledge and understanding, of such force and wisdom and idealism as to compel Congress and others to follow. That no one is in sight at this moment who answers to this description is no reason why the Democracy should not seek him; in a people of 115,000,000 he can be found.

Government by Blackmail

SENATOR STERLING of South Dakota is perturbed. He made a three-hour speech in the Senate to explain the causes of his perturbation; but he left his hearers in doubt. Senator Sterling was the one member of the Senate committee on the indictment of Senator Wheeler who refused to sign a report completely exonerating him. From the three-hour speech most correspondents got the impression that Mr. Sterling thought the Montana Senator guilty as charged, but when Senator Underwood later asked if he believed Wheeler guilty Sterling replied "No." After laboriously plowing through his interminable discourse we have come to the conclusion that Senator Sterling is perturbed because he is afraid that the attempt of the Department of Justice and of the Republican National Committee to "frame" Senator Wheeler will react injuriously upon Calvin Coolidge, and by nothing else.

In this he resembles his chief and the entire crew of easy consciences which today rule this land. Mr. Coolidge and his party leaders are not concerned to root out rottenness in the seats of government, but they are misusing their power to discredit the investigations which are revealing that rottenness. There has been corruption, Mr. Coolidge coolly comments, "but the wonder is not that this was so much or so many; rather that it has been so little or so few." "It would be foolish, false, and unpatriotic," says Mr. Hughes, "to breed distrust . . . of the integrity of the Government," and with an air of Olympian contentment with things as they are he remarks: "There are crooks in every community and in every party. Now and then one gets into office." The Massachusetts Calvin Coolidge Finance Committee was caught red-handed evading, if not violating, the corrupt-practice law against large contributions by sending out letters asking for large gifts in this brazen language:

There is no limit to the amount an individual may give the committee. Large contributions will be so divided as to give full observance to the requirements of the statutes.

When this indecency was exposed in the Senate, Henry Cabot Lodge, Republican floor leader, and scion of the Puritans, had nothing better to say than that

I have been sitting here and hearing these outbreaks of virtue about matters of this kind, but there is not a member of the Senate who does not know that money is raised for campaigns in every State of the Union.

Not one word of indignation at the act of Secretary Fall in accepting $100,000 in a satchel; not a word of bitterness at Mr. Denby for giving away the nation's oil or at Harry Daugherty for his regime of personal trickery has yet escaped the lips of any leader in the Administration—only vituperation at those who, in the face of public stolidity and official opposition, have relentlessly hewed out the truth. What wonder if Senator Sterling, a lame duck in need of official favors, misrepresents the facts and still attempts to poison the public mind toward the man who forced Harry Daugherty and William J. Burns out of office?

Senator Sterling's minority report was ostensibly based upon the theory that the Senate committee should not have inquired into Senator Wheeler's guilt or innocence, but only into the question whether the indictment was justified by the evidence before the grand jury. But the language of the Senate resolution was clear: "That a committee . . .

investigate and report to the Senate the facts in relation to the charges made in a certain indictment returned against Senator Burton K. Wheeler." Senators Borah and Caraway brought out the fact that Senator Sterling never once, in the discussion in the Senate or in the questioning before the committee, suggested such a limitation of field; it was an afterthought, conceived in order to embarrass Senator Wheeler, not in any sense an honest objection. Senator Sterling's pettiness led his fellow committee-members to reveal the fact that throughout the hearings he acted as an agent for unknown parties—presumably the same who inspired the false indictment. He came to committee meetings armed with secret memoranda and passages from letters which he refused to show to other committeemen.

The latest revelation is perhaps the most loathsome of all. "Ned" McLean's confidential man, W. O. Duckstein, and his wife, recently William J. Burns's confidential stenographer, have finally told their stories. They testify that Department of Justice agents have shown them Gaston Means's records, which they had stolen; and that female detectives have been placed in the retiring rooms close to Senator Wheeler's office to listen to conversations in the hope of picking up something of interest; that other detectives were sent to Montana and Iowa to look up Senators Wheeler and Brookhart; and that Senator Caraway and Representatives Woodruff and Keller were also investigated when they dared attack Daugherty in Congress.

"The less attention we pay to it the better," commented Senator Jones of Washington, Administration Republican.

"I think it is time to find out what this government by blackmail is," replied Senator Brookhart.

Mr. Coolidge and his cohorts plainly agree with Senator Jones; we believe that the people of this country stand with Senator Brookhart.

America and the Dawes Plan

THERE is one important phase of the Dawes plan which has been overlooked. The United States, by virtue of the Knox Resolution and the Treaty of Berlin, is awaiting payment by Germany of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission now sitting in Washington. Germany's treaty with the United States provides for the payment of these claims; and she was forced to acquiesce in the retention by the United States, as a pledge of such payment, of the sequestered private property which German citizens, relying upon our laws and our invitation, had invested in the United States. That property is held, subject to congressional power at any time to return the property to its owners, until Germany makes "suitable provision for the satisfaction of" the claims of American citizens.

Most of these claims, the total of which is likely to be about 200 million dollars, have no standing in international law; they were imposed upon Germany by the victors without regard to Germany's legal liability for the injuries out of which they arose. Thus to tie up private property as security for a governmental debt is a perversion of American traditions and of international law, but the present Secretary of State has consistently sought to counteract the growing public opinion in favor of the restoration of this property, depleted as it is by the maladministration of Palmer and Garvan, to its owners, and we have not even paid for the ninety private merchant ships which Congress, in war time, authorized the President to take title to and possession of under eminent domain, with the implied promise to pay for them. Thus far only a small part of the property has been returned by Congress.

Mr. Hughes's objection has rested upon the ostensible ground that the American claims had not been provided for. But he appears to have made no effort to help in providing for the payment of these claims in an honorable way, as would be possible by a little diplomatic insistence, and seems to have been content to look to the ultimate confiscation of the property. President Harding, on the other hand, stated publicly that it was contrary to American traditions to confiscate private property for the discharge of a public debt of a foreign government. The Dawes Report brings the occasion for definite action. The Secretary of State should overcome his apparent aversion to making requests upon France and England by insisting that the United States also has its claims to be satisfied; he should demand our modest share in the payments to be effected by Germany under the Dawes Report. These will not exceed 12 to 15 million dollars a year for thirty years.

Since the Dawes Report fixes the maximum which can be exacted from Germany for many years, failure to make a timely request upon the Allies would put the United States in the same lamentable position which we occupied when the Allies, without apparent objection by the Department of State, distributed among themselves the reimbursed costs of the armies of occupation, conveniently overlooking the expenses of our army on the Rhine. Sharing in the Dawes Report payments to the very limited extent required would enable the American claimants to be paid and would remove the last objection to the prompt restoration to its owners of the private alien property still held by the United States. Germany is helpless in this matter and cannot convert her willingness to pay us into a promise unless the Allies give their consent. We have sufficient diplomatic means to assure this consent, although it is humiliating that we should have to bargain for it. If the Secretary of State would now act as if the United States were something more than a tool for certain foreign Powers, he could go far to restore American diplomacy to its pre-war integrity. If he does not act of his own initiative, Congress might well provide the necessary stimulus.

Biography Made to Order

PERHAPS the best historical biography of the American year is Robert McElroy's life of Grover Cleveland. One of the interesting things about it is that the author was selected by the family to do this work, and the former President's papers were placed at his disposal. In a sense, therefore, it was an official life. Yet Mr. McElroy has written without restraint, as a teacher and a man of letters ought to. That freedom undoubtedly gives to the work much of its spontaneity and interest and is in marked contrast to some recent biographies which have been written to order, the biographer being employed at so much a month, or so much for the job. Mr. Bishop's life of A. B. Hepburn, the financier, belongs, if we are rightly informed, to the latter class. It lacks the sweep and the wide range and the critical independence the subject merited. Not that it is untruthful or unfaithful. The picture is simply not rounded out, nor the man brought into focus with the tendencies of his time, or with his associates, as he might have been. If our judgment is correct, the historian in this case was rather a recorder than an analyst, a por-trayer than an assayer.

Obviously the problem of recording and presenting to the public a truthful narrative of the life of a man of distinction is not easy when it is undertaken by relatives of the subject. If someone comes forward stirred by the man to be depicted, yet desirous of presenting him judicially, the difficulty may be met. When no volunteer appears there often follows a search for someone to do the job at a salary the mere acceptance of which may make impossible that freedom of utterance and independence of judgment which are essential to any worthwhile biography. Occasionally the subject is such, as in the case of Henry G. Pearson's life of General James W. Wadsworth, that the question of an unfavorable criticism does not arise to disturb the harmonies of the occasion. But where there is need, as in the case of a Grover Cleveland, of a discriminating judgment, where there is the necessity of awarding both praise and blame, of pointing out the mistakes as well as the noble qualities and fine deeds of the man to be studied, the dangers are obvious. The shelves of biography are filled with books like Sanborn's life of John Brown and Channing's life of Margaret Fuller, written with little regard to truth, chiefly to glorify the subjects, though in these cases the biographers were under no financial restraint.

The ethical problem presented is simple, and it would seem as if no writer of standing, particularly no teacher of youth, could engage for compensation to write any biography without assurance of the most complete freedom. But if it is a simple problem, it is extraordinary how often it is neither understood nor the ethical responsibility observed. Particularly is this true in the field of autobiography. Here book after book turns up in which it is obvious that the man whose name is signed to it has had nothing to do with the form in which it appears. The reputed author sends for a Burton J. Hendrick, or someone of similar experience, and talks his various adventures and achievements to him, who in turn Englishes them for the public. When the literary man's name does not appear upon the title-page it can hardly be considered as anything more than a kind of fraud upon the public. In the case of Admiral Sims's narrative of the war on the sea, the right thing was obviously done in putting both the admiral's name and that of Mr. Hendrick upon the title-page.

Yet the temptation is, we suppose, great to suppress the name of the all-important assistant. Some brilliant woman who has never written a line yields to the temptation of a publisher to set forth in print her achievements, her friendships, her points of view, and then, of course, she must have a trained writer's assistance. Sometimes the personality of the avowed author disappears under the ministrations of the hack who comes to her aid, in which case we get a double fraud upon the public. Nor can the publishers be acquitted of some share of the blame when this takes place. It can hurt no entertaining work of autobiography to state the name of the collaborator, as Admiral Sims did. Anything else seems to us less than honest. Similarly, when the history of a man who has passed from the scene is written for a financial consideration from friends or family, the fact ought to be clearly stated. There is nothing immoral or improper in such an arrangement, only in concealing the existence of it.

I Return to America

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

MY dentist is a good fellow and an excellent workman. Naturally, after a year and a half abroad I saw him before I saw such unimportant persons as publishers, tax-collectors, and old friends, and it was he who first gave me the opportunity to view again that passion for politics which the citizens of a republic, particularly the American republic, are universally known to possess.

Between moments of the indignity which only dentists can force upon one, I babbled, "How's the political situation coming out? Who—whom—will they nominate?"

"Well—The cement, Miss Jones."

It was the fieriest statement about American politics I had heard since the Scythia had slid out of Southampton harbor.

"No, but I say really—" with that effort to retain something of an English accent which upsets one for three days after landing—"really, though, whom would you like to see the Democrats put in?"

"Oh, that's all decided. They'll put in Al Smith."

"What sort of a chap is Al?"

"Oh, he's all right, I guess. I don't know much about him."

"What about the Republicans?"

"Just keep the mouth open till the filling hardens."

"Bgbb—"

"Well, if you want to know how I feel about it, I'll tell you how I feel about it: The best thing that could happen to the country would be to have everything run on the way it's going now, and have Coolidge elected."

"The investigations—"

"Oh, I'm getting tired of them."

"But doesn't it seem to you—I kept hearing in England that Cal Coolidge was the most colorless man that ever lived—that he came as near to being nothing at all as a man could be and go on living?"

"Well, maybe that's so, but better have him than a radical."

Thus the interviewer peered again, half terrified by its frenzy, into the turmoil of passionate popular government.

Years ago he had concluded that in these independent and virile States the chief explanation to political puzzles was that there is no interest in politics. Only two classes of persons are exceptions. The first is of those who are more or less professionally engaged in the matter, including not only all the seekers after offices requiring neither brains nor labor—the willing ones who will take anything from the governorship of a State down to an ambassadorship—but journalists, ardent reformers, and the bankers and manufacturers who desire to pet and gently lead the politicians. The second class is the Arguers, the Old Boys, the men who set round the stove or sit round the table in an urban club—they differ only in the verb—and find a benign pleasure, undisturbed by intellection, in treadmilling the ancient discussions.

This second class does not really have an interest in politics; it merely seems to. The rule of their game is that nothing may be said which has not always been said, and that nothing may be said which has not its unchangeable, canonical answer, preterminable and rather off the point: As:

"Who the dickens is Cal, though, that's what I want to ask!"

"Well, he settled the Boston police strike, all right!"

"He did not settle no Boston police strike! The whole thing was settled before he ever ordered out the militia!"

"Oh, trouble with you is, you been reading The Nation and all these radical rags. 'F I'd my way, I'd put all those soreheads in jail! Let me tell you right now, Coolidge has won my respect by the enemies he's made. Whenever you find a lot of these parlor socialists panning a feller you can be dead sure he's a feller you can bank on."

"Yuh, that's all right, but nobody knows what Cal stands for except about the bonus."

"Sure, because he knows how to keep his mouth shut."

"D'ever occur to you that there's two kinds of fellers that keep their mouths shut—those that ain't giving any advice free, and those that don't say nothing because they ain't got anything to say?"

This is but the beginning of the conference; thus was Lincoln discussed, no doubt, thus certainly Cleveland and Taft. Always it has been our only type of political inquiry outside of the more professional, "You leave it to me—If he gets me the publicity, I'll see he gets a swell job." But in this year and a half, hearing from afar of revolutionary revelations, imagining among the green and pleasant spaces of the Temple, E. C., that the vigorous American people were seizing for themselves some part of their government, the interviewer was so naive as to think that when he returned he would find his countrymen as much interested in politics as in motors or even radio. In Europe he had discovered that political talk may be more absorbing than literary gossip or the best scandals about one's friends. He came loping on the steamer at Southampton to gloat over the spectacle of Americans with girded loins.

There were business men aboard who had come to London for but a few days, who were only a fortnight out of New York. He brightly inquired of them:

"Say—say—tell me—tell me—what's prospects for the conventions?"

"Well, I don't know, but I think all this darned fool investigating at Washington is about run out, and everybody's ready to settle down to business. Way I figure it out, the soreheads have got to run wild every so often, and then the country goes to work again."

"But whom d' you think they'll nominate?"

"Well, don't know 's I've given a whole lot of thought to the subject. Those things are best left in the hands of the fellows that are competent to handle 'em. I suppose they'll put up Cal and Al—never thought o' that—makes pretty good slogan, eh—Cal or Al! Well, that's about all I know about the situation, but say, here's something that might interest you. When you left, remember you used to have to pay ten or fifteen a quart for hooch? Well, I can give you the address of an absolutely reliable bootlegger, nice young fellow, too, that'll supply you with first-rate Scotch for fifty-five a case."

Thus the mailed warrior, leaping in the younger sunlight of our Western land.

There were aboard the steamer not only these bearers of new tidings but nearly a hundred people who had been spending five months in going round the world. I wanted to know how many of them, so long deprived of news about the revolution in America, were panting for information.

They were not.

I could get only one of them to talk politics. He was an Old Timer from California, a judge, a plainsman, an Eagle. He reflected:

"You wouldn't be such a bad fellow, if you didn't fall for all this radical stuff. I've been looking into politics for forty years, and I've figured out that the parties will be able to take care of the nominations without my advice."

So the interviewer came to America, turned in a disgustingly honest customs declaration, and rediscovered his native land. . . . Just how appallingly high the high buildings are. In Paris or Rome or Madrid, the buildings are forgotten in the liveliness of the human stream; in New York the streets are deep and intimidating grooves in which the people are vermin; and in the department stores a shopper is but an animal in the cattle-pen, insufferably robbed of dignity. . . . The young women, so pretty, so well-dressed, so hard of eye. . . . The men, everywhere, who speak in unchanging voices of heavy and pompous brassiness, and contemptuously roll in the corners of their mouths cigars of a curious ugliness. . . . But also the friendliness, the hope, and the quicker minds. . . . A group at lunch—Mencken, Hergesheimer, De Kruif, Nathan: as distinguished as any group of writers under the age of fifty-five to be found in Europe, as scholarly and deft, and beyond belief more vigorous, direct, merry, free from attitudinizing.

Everywhere, indeed, a battle—except in politics!

The interviewer has talked to journalists, merchants, bell boys, bewildered Western farmers, taxi-drivers, women who know the Place Vendome, and a few other varieties, and has not yet been able to find any tiniest change of the old rule; has not yet been able to find one who is interested in politics unless he touches it professionally. It is typified in the observation of a scientist, an authority on biophysics:

"Politics? Hell! I've never voted in my life."

The interviewer left London believing that the coming conventions would be the most important since the second nomination of Lincoln. He now believes that no matter how voluminously the newspapers may feature their jazz enthusiasms, the People will have as much share and almost as much authentic interest in them as the average Bronx delicatessen dealer takes in Anglo-Catholic conferences.

Now in England—

Oh, it is quite true that the hereditary leaders still possess power. A Cecil, a Chamberlain, a Curzon is as yet only a little dismayed by the Labor invasion. Yet in that unfortunate, that undemocratic and monarchy-ridden land, the citizenry from navvy to du'le have the notion that politics is their own affair, and that the personalities of politicians are not to be summed up with an invariable "He settled the police strike," but to be analyzed, watched, discussed. Indeed when London had its own police strike, there was no cautiously bold Calvin using it for kudos. It was settled by the Commissioner, General Sir Nevil McCready, who won the sneaking respect of even the strikers and of the Laborite journalists. When the strike-leaders were called in to fight things out with him, they found on the wall behind his desk, so that they must sit facing it, a Socialist poster damning him as a tyrant, and somehow it dampened them.

The House of Commons is not duller and more decorous than the House of Representatives but far livelier, more human, and Viscount Curzon is quite as likely as Jack Jones to throw bricks. While no one but a humorist would think of reading the Congressional Record, the reports of the proceedings of Parliament, as they appear daily in the London Times and the rest, are followed by thousands.

No social affair in London, whether it is the dinner-party of a retired Anglo-Indian general or the communion of two char-ladies blissful with gin in the public bar, can run all its course without politics appearing. . . . F. E., L. G., Winston, Freddy Banbury, Nancy, Max, Austin, Ramsay, Uncle Arthur—a score of the leaders are treated with the affectionate or angry familiarity which in this generation we have given only to T. R. and Gene Debs.

There is an exhilaration in it. Even the blank outsider, permitted only to listen, feels a quick and incessant drama. For all the permanence of the monarchy and the House of Lords, politics are never static in Britain. Where in America each four years there is an artificial contest whose appearance has no relation to the actual needs of affairs, in Britain the Government may last five years and may go out in six weeks, with always enough by-elections to keep the kettle violently stirred. When a general election does come, the candidates are too busy really fighting to have time for that long, bombastic, quadrennial campaign whose pomposities are proof not that there is popular interest but rather that only by drum-pounding can any interest be stirred.

But this lack of lively drama is unimportant. One can take his meat unsalted, even though he may not comprehend why one hundred-odd million people should prefer tasteless fare. The thing is that here in this world-dominating United States, to which all of Europe is looking with wistfulness or with fear, in this country which unquestionably can do what it likes with all other nations, we do not rule ourselves. We, the plain people, the authors and bootmakers and doctors and fishmongers, have not only handed the mastery over to a group of inconceivably unintelligent salesmen, but decline even to care how they control us. We like it! We say, "Well, he may not be anything at all, but at least he isn't a radical!"

And to the returned and melancholy pilgrim comes a growing fear which he cannot define. If this year again the delegates in the conventions and the voters back home let themselves be swallowed in mush (but the mush is not ladled out by mushy men; their jaws are hard and their eyes cold); if this year again the few persons who protest against our drifting into supreme mediocrity are dismissed as cranks and parlor socialists and answered only, "Ah, gwan back to Europe," then he will see no reason to hope that anything save a monstrous calamity will lift us out of our fat and cigar-chewing indifference.

Still, there are the youngsters in colleges. Are they smug, too? The interviewer is going out to see.

Human Rights in the Coal Fields—A Debate

Dynamite Versus Profits

By "AN OPERATOR"

THIS is not a philosophical or a wholly unbiased discussion of the coal industry, nor does it offer any golden rule for the solution of its numerous problems. I am not a professor, editor, publicist, or politician. My business is the production of coal at such a price that the public will buy and the cost of operation will be defrayed. My ambition is to make a profit. Specifically, I produce coal in Somerset County, Pennsylvania, the non-union field already made famous in song and story by various investigations, reports, and recommendations, by gentlemen from the Bureau of Industrial Research, by committees of professors and clergymen, by his honor Mayor Hylan of New York City and his Commissioner of Accounts Hirshfield, and many, many others.

These reports and recommendations are usually interesting, sometimes well written, and, in my opinion, are wholly beside the point. What disturbs me most about these contributions to our industry is that they show such a total disregard of the facts, and so little understanding. It is one thing to have one's living depend upon a given quantity of philosophical or literary output, and another to have it depend upon a balance sheet. And most of the investigators have not by training learned the importance of the facts nor the penalties for their neglect.

Our mines in Somerset County are operated upon a non-union basis, which is to say that except for such times as the United Mine Workers are "hell-bent" on organizing us via dynamite-machine-gun methods it makes no difference whether a man belongs to the United Mine Workers, the Holy Rollers, the Ku Klux Klan, or anything else. All we require is that he be reasonably honest and that he be a coal miner. Since April, 1922, we have been besieged by the agitators' organizers of the United Mine Workers, who officially declared a strike against us. During the early months, aided by the national strike pressure and certain other things, production was partially stopped, but toward the end of that summer nearly every company was operating and before the end of the year production was normal. Nevertheless, the strike was officially continued nearly a year thereafter, and a small group of irreconcilables plus a professional United Mine Workers' strike gang was maintained in specially erected barracks located on the fringe of each mining community.

The object of this long strike, and upon this both union officials and myself agree, was the recognition of the United Mine Workers of America, or, specifically, the signing of a wage contract with that organization providing that no man should be paid until its officials determined what fraction of his wages should be deducted and paid directly to them for dues, special assessments, fines, penalties, and other items designed for spiritual welfare; in other words, the check-off. For refusing this recognition we and our miners have suffered much, and although we have operated now continuously for over a year it has been neither easy nor pleasant.

Our own miners have several times expressed their opposition to the present policies of the United Mine Workers, especially the check-off, and have petitioned that no contract be signed.

This the various investigators who visit Somerset County usually overlook. In fact, these investigators never seem to consider it worth while to ask the opinion of the man who is working. In theory apparently he is a poor, ignorant cuss anyway (he must be ignorant if he works when he could get strike benefits) and therefore the union officials certainly know better than he what he thinks, or, at least, what he should think.

For the last year of the strike the number of men working was approximately 12,500 and the number striking approximately 1,500. During this time the 1,500 did nothing but brood over their wrongs, vilify their more industrious neighbors, and take an occasional pot-shot at them with anything from a rotten egg to a stick of dynamite, just to show that their heart was in the right place and they lived off strike benefits furnished by the check-off from union miners belonging to District No. 2, of which Somerset County is theoretically a part.

It was easy for the casual investigator (and most of them are casual, if nothing else) to obtain the viewpoint of this minority group of strikers, but exceedingly difficult to get it from the men who were working. The small groups of strikers were always accessible and ready and anxious to talk. The men at work were busy, and besides they did not take kindly to strangers, for they had been the victims of a long campaign of intimidation, and they were apprehensive lest the visitor be a union agent, there for the purpose of gathering information against them.

How would you feel toward a stranger if you and your group were constantly threatened and reviled because you had elected to work, and you had seen from time to time houses of your fellow-workers blown up after mysterious warnings and every so often one of your number was caught out alone and beaten up or shot? Suppose also you knew that the money from the local funds of the United Mine Workers of America had been used to buy dynamite and to purchase arms and ammunition for the publicly avowed use against you. This is not idle gossip. It is a matter of fact proved in court and later substantiated by the United Mine Workers themselves. I would also note that for obvious reasons the average Somerset County miner greatly prefers the company or closed town.

I recently read a report written by a group of clergymen and professors who for some reason chose to call themselves A Committee on Coal and Civil Liberties and to constitute themselves the champion of the United Mine Workers' organization. It is a fair example of the patent medicine recommended for coal ills.

The report is largely directed against the so-called "closed town" with its special leases, private roads, deputy sheriffs, etc. It is solemnly revealed that certain of these company towns are actually "closed" against organizers of the United Mine Workers of America. A better term would be "fortified." Is it any wonder, in view of the way they have been attacked? Even though it be good biblical manners to turn the other cheek, it is not healthy, nor can mining operations be continued under this system. It might be more simple to sign a union contract, but some of us prefer to refuse and to enjoy our constitutional right to be shot at by the United Mine Workers of America.

The report also avers that the school-teachers are frequently paid and the amusement halls and stores erected and owned by the operators. True, but when a company opens up a mine in some outlying district and several thousand people come there to live, someone must provide schools, recreation halls, cinemas, pay school-teachers, erect stores, houses, etc. No matter what is said to the contrary, these things do not descend from heaven. The county and State will not provide them. In many places, they will not even pay adequate salaries to the school-teachers. The operators would gladly turn over the expense and management of these things to any responsible authority, and as a matter of fact, in the older mining communities, the county or State comes to assume these responsibilities.

This also applies to police protection, about which so much has been written. I refer particularly to the deputy-sheriff system whereby coal companies must pay the wages of the police officers deputized for their district. I speak officially when I say that it is thoroughly and constantly condemned by all the coal operators of our county. Many investigators appear to think that they have exposed a secret and nefarious practice of the coal operators when they prove that in certain counties, notably Somerset, the sheriff received from the coal companies $1 a day for each man he has deputized for their district. Alas, this is not a secret. Neither is it bribery. It is a matter of State and county law. From the operators' point of view, it is a hold-up. Any man who will run on a platform to abolish this dollar-a-day payment to the sheriff and to provide a county-paid police force will receive 100 per cent of the votes of the Somerset County coal operators for any office which he may desire. I would also like to call attention to the fact that the United Mine Workers, while they orate against those whom the operators are forced to employ, also opposed the establishment of trained State and county police to eliminate these guards. They have sought to have abolished the State constabulary in West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and in Colorado, where they have partially succeeded. They successfully prevented the enactment of a law in West Virginia to provide for the payment of all deputy sheriffs by the county. In Ohio and Illinois they have successfully prevented any legislation providing for State constabulary. The ultimate goal would seem to be the abolishment of all police.

I think our results support the theory that labor and capital have a common interest. The yearly earnings of our miners have usually been higher than those of the miners in the adjacent union field, District No. 2. From 1903, when we ended our relations with the United Mine Workers, to the present we have had only three or four local strikes and the general one of 1922 as against thousands in the adjoining union field, District No. 2, during the same period. The study by the Bituminous Operators' Special Committee of several hundred mines in various districts which either changed from union to non-union, or vice versa, showed an almost universal decrease in the cost per ton in favor of non-union operation, while the earnings (not wage scale) of the men were higher.

I wish the various writers upon the coal industry and denunciators of the coal operators would look at things in a more reasonable and practical way. Personally, I think the United Mine Workers have much the upper hand of the operators—and also of the public.

It seems to me that the check-off is a more complete abridgment of American constitutional rights than anything now charged against the operator.

But again, this is a matter of philosophy, and I would rather leave that to people who know something about it.

Profits by Dynamite

By WINTHROP D. LANE

URBANITY is always pleasant, and a gentle contempt for one's opponents gives a feeling of superiority to any disputant. The anonymous coal operator whose remarks precede mine has both of these in abundance. He is not to be pushed into any loss of temper. He regards the efforts of all journalists, investigators, and others to understand the coal industry from the outside as bordering on impertinence. Having been trained in the business of mining soft coal—in which, according to Herbert Hoover, the waste is shameful and the business technique defective—he naturally has a sure grasp of facts. "Come," he says to all writers on the subject, "you have worried us long enough with your lucubrations. Let someone who knows the industry now speak. Sit at my feet and we shall have a lesson—in facts."

I accept his challenge to meet him on the battleground of facts. First, let me call attention briefly to his general point of view. Trend of mind is important in any controversy; and A. O.—I can save space by using his initials—has that trend of mind that persuades him to opinions that he wishes to hold. He has amplified his argument with the conventional notions of non-union coal operators. He has cast this argument, also, into the form of a discussion of Somerset County, but in reality he has given his remarks a much wider sweep. He opens the door widely to deductions concerning the whole non-union field, and so I am forced to meet him on broader geographical ground.

When A. O. intimates, as he strongly does, that the United Mine Workers of America is a violence-practicing organization and always tries to win its victories by the "dynamite-machine-gun" method, he is merely saying what his brother opponents of the union habitually say. This is a cry that can be heard from every non-union district in West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama. The trouble with it is that he leaves out of the picture such scenes as Cabin Creek, Trinidad, Coronado, and others, where the machine-guns were on the side of the coal companies and where many miners fell pumped full of bullets. In Mingo County, West Virginia, the sheriff not long ago took from operators more rifles than he could stack in his vaults. In an adjoining county, Logan, an operator showed me a score or more of high-powered guns and said: "This is my arsenal." Operators use violence to keep the union and its agents out of the neighborhood; "company guards" and deputy sheriffs paid by coal companies help them. It is perfectly true, as A. O. says, that local funds of the union have been used to purchase arms, but funds of operators have been so used also. The United States Coal Commission dismissed, as held only by "a certain type of mind," the notion that it has been the ultimate object of union officials to "unionize all the mines by force if necessary."

Again A. O. echoes a characteristic assertion of his non-union colleagues when he says that his miners do not want the union and would not take it if he gave it to them. This is evidence of a strong tendency toward wish-fulfilment. A. O. hopes his miners would not take it. What miners really think is shown every time they get a real chance to join the union: witness the coming into the union ranks of one field after another through thirty years. In A. O.'s own little district of Somerset County there was a spontaneous rush to the union in the early weeks of the nation-wide coal strike of 1922. In the towns of Windber, Conemaugh, Revloc, Boliver, Twin Rocks, Park Hill, Seanor, Central City, Salco, and others, miners joined the union hand over fist; seasoned union organizers stood amazed at the proportions of the rush. A. O.'s statement that only 1,500 out of a total force of 14,000 joined the union differs from every other estimate. A staff member of the Bureau of Industrial Research, who spent many weeks in Somerset County, reported that 6,000 struck, and striking is no indication of the extent of union sympathy; it is too dangerous to income and family. Neither is A. O.'s estimate borne out by the figures for lost production compiled by the U. S. Geological Survey for this period. That many of these strikers later returned to work, especially when they believed their cause lost, is not remarkable; miners are human and must earn money. His assertion that Somerset miners have several times petitioned against the union is, to say the least of it, going some. Does he mean that he can actually produce the documents?

Let us come to more important matters. "Except for such times," says A. O., "as the United Mine Workers are 'hell-bent' on organizing us, it makes no difference whether a man belongs to the United Mine Workers, the Holy Rollers, the Ku Klux Klan, or anything else." This is important, because it suggests a tolerance that is not generally known to exist. Let us see if A. O.'s statement is accurate. Would he say that it shows unconcern over membership in a union if the employers required, or tried to induce, their men to sign agreements by which the men bound themselves to have nothing to do with the union so long as they kept their jobs? These are the notorious "yellow-dog" contracts which are in use in Somerset County today. I have before me the contract used by the Quemahoning Creek Coal Company, which reads in part: "The said employee, who affirms that he is not now a member of any labor organization, agrees not to join or belong to any labor union or organization, and will not aid, encourage, or approve the organization thereof." The employer agrees, on his part, not to employ knowingly "any member of the United Mine Workers of America, of the I. W. W., or any mine labor organization." Is this to be indifferent to the membership of your men in a union? These agreements deprive a man of the right to join a legal organization. The United States Coal Commission says that they "are closely tied up with the suppression of civil liberties." Yet they are in use in Somerset County.

A. O. mentions earnings. He says that the earnings of miners in Somerset have been greater than those in the unionized area of District No. 2 of the United Mine Workers, of which Somerset County, if organized, would be a part. This statement, by itself, means little; the mining conditions and other opportunities for employment in Somerset may be better. But A. O.'s statement is open to question of another sort. According to the United States Coal Commission the median earnings of tonnage men in Somerset County, for a given period, were $1,280; in all unionized portions of Pennsylvania, including District No. 2, they were $1,320. This does not seem to bear out A. O.'s statement.

Nor can the matter be dropped there. A. O.'s references to earnings suggest a more far-reaching implication. One can easily infer that he thinks that earnings in non-union fields, taking the country by and large, are greater than earnings in union fields. That is a favorite contention of non-union operators. They slip it into the ears of visitors and trumpet it to Senate committees. Let us look at it. Again, the Coal Commission has supplied the nail that punctures A. O.'s tires. It has compared earnings in many non-union with those in many union fields. This is difficult, because so many varying factors enter into the calculation. So the commission adopted the sound method of counting the number of "starts," that is, the number of times men entered the mines to work, required to earn given amounts of money in union fields with the number of starts required to earn the same amounts in non-union. It found that machine miners required 112 starts, on the average, to earn $1,000 in union fields, 144 in non-union; 157 starts to earn $1,500 in union fields, 171 in non-union; 188 starts to earn $2,000 in union fields, 203 in non-union, and so on. The figures for the two other classes of men who actually dig coal, pick-miners and loaders, yielded a similar showing; those for outside day men, who receive fixed wages by the day, gave a still more striking showing in favor of the union fields.

It is an ingratiating picture that A. O. gives us of Somerset County miners. "Look at their faces," he exclaims, "see how happy they are! They like the houses we give them, they like us!" Now, it is to be supposed that, if all this were true, men who went to work in Somerset County would stay there. They wouldn't move away to other fields continuously. Yet that is exactly what they do. I hesitate to mention the Coal Commission again, but the commission looked into this question of contentment and stability of labor force. It went into Somerset County. And it found that whereas the labor turnover, in technical phrase, is only 65 per cent in such typical union districts as Indiana, northern Ohio, and central Illinois, it is 121 per cent in Somerset! This means that the stream of miners leaving Somerset is nearly twice as large, in relation to the number employed there, as it is in those union areas. The commission left no doubt as to the meaning of this. High rates of turnover, it comments, are due to "such things as unsatisfactory wage rates, poor working conditions, inadequate earnings, irregularity of employment, poor supervision, or objectionable community conditions." Even that detestable unionized district of central Pennsylvania, which is a kind of miasmic bog near A. O.'s mines, has a labor turnover of only 82 per cent. It actually seems to keep men better than Somerset.

Other parts of A. O.'s discussion may be dismissed more briefly. He and his fellow-operators have no use, he says, for privately paid deputy sheriffs. They exist merely because the county does not provide an adequate police force. That is a commendable position. The trouble is that it means little to mine workers whose bodies are beaten and who are driven from the neighborhood by these public officials drawing their money entirely from the coal companies. A. O. must go further than mere disapproval. The situation is one that calls for reform.

A. O.'s frank defense of the closing of company towns against outside intrusion—"fortifying" is his amazing word—may be left to itself. The Coal Commission found such restrictions "ill-advised, obnoxious, and inconsistent with the spirit of free local communities." Again, A. O. wholly misses the point in his rhapsodic defense of the generosity of coal operators who pay the salaries of teachers and perform other generous acts. No one condemns the generosity of this. It is the paternalism that galls. Everything that goes on in coal towns, from the sale of groceries to the control of roads, is done by the coal companies. Paternalism may not be objectionable in small doses, but when a whole village is run by a single corporation, that corporation possesses a power that may be over-used. It is over-used when the villagers are told who may and who may not visit them. At best, it is unhealthy and helps to explain the desire for a union, which represents a force of the men themselves.

"An Operator" Makes Reply

TAKING Mr. Lane's "scenes" in his "battleground of facts," "Cabin Creek, Trinidad, Coronado, and others," I note first that no one had any bullets "pumped" into them from machine-guns at either Cabin Creek or Coronado. At Coronado the chief casualties consisted of two captured non-union miners murdered, after what the Supreme Court said "the overwhelming weight of evidence" showed "was purely a union attack under the guidance of district officers." In Trinidad the miners had several times as many men under arms as the entire State National Guard. Of the 5,200 miners in Mingo, 4,931 signed a petition to the Senate investigating committee, stating that they did not wish to become members of the United Mine Workers, and asking for protection.

Why shouldn't an operator have an arsenal, if, as in Mingo and Logan, over 6,000 armed members of the United Mine Workers, supported by machine-gun units and ammunition trains, had marched upon them to take the mines by force?

The contract of the Quemahoning Creek Coal Company, to which Mr. Lane refers, was introduced by that company as a defensive measure in the spring of 1923, after their employees had been subject to continual attack for nearly a year by union pickets camped at the mine entrance. Its purpose was to secure an injunction against this picketing, and thereby to end the constant nagging and intimidation, with the more serious attending dangers.

The Bureau of Industrial Research figures, used by Mr. Lane, are open to question. The bureau's star investigator later became the official strike leader. Mr. Lane's Geological Survey figures do not refer to the last year of the strike.

According to the Coal Commission, writes Mr. Lane, the median earnings "in all unionized portions of Pennsylvania, including District No. 2, were $1,320." If Mr. Lane will study the report again, he will note that the $1,320 applies only to 94 union mines in the Pittsburgh district, and that the non-union miners of this same Pittsburgh district had an average of $1,825. For Mr. Lane's information I may add that the Pittsburgh district is entirely separate from the Central Pennsylvania district and that Somerset is usually grouped with central Pennsylvania, being just south of it. The central Pennsylvania union miners have averaged $1,180 a year, while the central Pennsylvania non-union miners averaged $1,405, and Somerset miners $1,280.

I did not say union miners earned less per start than non-union miners. I said our non-union miners earned more money per year than the adjacent union miners, because with less strikes and lower costs we give them more steady employment.

Mr. Lane's Rejoinder

THE steel-plated baggage coach that rolled up a creek valley in the Cabin Creek (W. Va.) region in 1913 and pumped bullets from a machine-gun into a miners' village, killing two people, has become history. At Ludlow, near Trinidad, in Colorado, in 1914, a tent colony of union miners was raked by machine-guns, the colony was then set on fire, and twenty charred bodies were recovered. It is amazing that A. O. does not know of these historic events; the records of congressional investigations will enlighten him. Granting that A. O. has scored a point in regard to Coronado, my main contention is still unaffected. I charged that coal companies, as well as miners, bought arms and committed violence. A. O. does not deny this. There is excellent ground for believing that armed "company guards" were the first users of violence in the coal fields. Certainly the "marches" in West Virginia were preceded by a long history of violence encouraged by coal companies.

I invited him to produce petitions from Somerset, and he mentions one from Mingo. There is none from Somerset. The Mingo petition was written and printed by the coal companies. Men signed it to keep their jobs.

The Consolidation Coal Company used "yellow-dog" contracts in Somerset also. They were discontinued only when John D. Rockefeller, Jr., a stockholder, protested.

A. O. apparently refers to Powers Hapgood when he speaks of the "star investigator" of the Bureau of Industrial Research. Mr. Hapgood did some work for the bureau but was never a staff member. The man I quoted was Heber Blankenhorn.

A. O. does not attempt to refute my evidence that union miners earn more than non-union miners, taking the country as a whole. Instead, he says that I have misread the commission report about union earnings in Pennsylvania. A table on page 9 of the report substantiates my statement. His figures are from a table three pages earlier, and there is a disparity between these two tables. The commission has contradicted itself. The doubt raised by this disparity, which I failed to notice, does not affect the more important question of country-wide earnings.

A. O. repeats his statement that men in Somerset get more steady employment. The turnover figures utterly deny it. I leave them to him for further contemplation. Meanwhile A. O. is to have the last word, which I shall not be permitted to answer in these columns.

Last Word by "An Operator"

TAKING all the "fracases" together in the "long history of violence," it is significant to note that the great property losses have always been suffered by the operators. Incidentally the congressional report on Cabin Creek does not mention the "plated baggage coach," while at Ludlow no operators or operator guards participated.

As noted, Mr. Lane does not admit that non-union miners are capable of self-expression. Hence, he reasons, ipso facto, their petitions cannot exist. Notwithstanding and contrary to Mr. Lane's assertion they have been and can be produced.

I did not attempt to refute Mr. Lane's evidence on country-wide earnings because he presented none. There are no adequate figures which would permit such a comparison. I referred specifically to Pennsylvania because Mr. Lane referred to it and the Coal Commission has collected data on the earnings of union and non-union miners working in the same field and under the same physical conditions. These figures show conclusively that the non-union miner earns more than the union miner. The table on page 9 is a reproduction of that three pages earlier. Mr. Lane has taken the figure for the union earnings in the central competitive field, Pennsylvania, to mean all of Pennsylvania. It does not. Only the Pittsburgh District is in the central competitive field. Central Pennsylvania is not in the central competitive field. The median earnings for all of union Pennsylvania would be the weighted average of the median for the Pittsburgh District, $1,320, and that of the Central Pennsylvania District, $1,180, or approximately $1,250. Mr. Lane solemnly juggles "turnovers" and "starts." Nevertheless, our exasperating Somerset miner continues to make more money than his union neighbor.

The Congressional Swan Song

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THIS Congress began singing on the note of the tax bill and the bonus bill. It began with arias addressed to the business man who wanted his taxes reduced and to the ex-soldier who wanted his compensation increased. These themes were difficult and dangerous enough.

Now, however, after long delay, our congressional singers are obliged to try to sing for the railroad trade unionist and for the farmer. They are obliged at last to exercise their voices over the complexities of the Howell-Barkley bill and the McNary-Haugen bill.

If it was difficult to please the business man and dangerous to please the ex-soldier, it is still more difficult to please the railroad trade unionist and still more dangerous to please the farmer.

Moreover, the business man and the ex-soldier, even if annoyed, are not likely, as classes, to go wandering off into third parties. Numerous railroad trade unionists and numerous farmers, on the other hand, are extremely likely at this time to indulge themselves in third-party travels in case their susceptibilities are wounded.

The Howell-Barkley bill was drawn up by the railroad trade unionists themselves. There is no doubt that it represents the mass convictions and the mass demands of the leaders of the railroad trade unions in the matter of the management of the relations between labor and capital and the public on railroads.

The McNary-Haugen bill is supported with amazing unanimity by the various farm organizations of the country.

It is further supported by numerous influential groups of city business men in the Northwest. The Seattle Chamber of Commerce wants it. The Spokane Chamber of Commerce wants it. The State bankers' associations of Washington and of Oregon and of Montana and of North Dakota and of South Dakota want it. Numerous groups of Northwestern Rotarians and of Kiwanis and of Lions have petitioned for it.

The Howell-Barkley bill is a strictly labor bill. The McNary-Haugen bill is a farmer and Northwestern bill.

These two bills combine the class interests and the sectional interests most likely to produce third-party developments. They will arouse, and are already arousing, in debates in Congress, a bitterness which the debates on the tax bill and on the bonus did not show.

The Howell-Barkley bill, unless this writer is more innocent than he thinks he is, represents a genuinely sincere and honest effort by the leaders of the railroad trade unions (with the legal help of Mr. Donald Richberg) to introduce a better and more peaceful set of relationships between labor and capital and the public on railroads.

The principal criticism of it is that it allows no representation for the public on certain "adjustment boards" which it establishes. The answer intended to repel this criticism would seem to have some merit. It is as follows:

The adjustment boards are designed to deal primarily with grievances arising under existing agreements. Such grievances are technical matters. They are family matters. Outsiders are not skilled at them. Therefore the membership of the adjustment boards should be confined to representatives of the employees and of the managers.

The representation of the public should begin when the broad principles of new agreements are being considered. This representation the Howell-Barkley bill abundantly grants. It establishes a Board of Mediation and Conciliation with a membership exclusively of representatives of the public appointed by the President. To this board the Howell-Barkley bill confides large powers, or, at any rate, large opportunities, in bringing public pressure to bear upon both the managers and the employees when new agreements are being proposed, considered, and achieved. The bill excites an opposition which is as sincere and alarmed as its own intention is sincere and determined. It will not pass if the Republican conservatives, by any hook or crook of parliamentary practice, can prevent the congressional majority which favors it from acting upon it.

Meanwhile, if the railroad trade unionists do not get it put into the statute books for them, they will go to their convention in Cleveland on July 4 with their susceptibilities stirred strongly toward third-party action.

Meanwhile if the Northwestern farmers and Rotarians and Kiwanis and Lions do not see the statute books adorned with the McNary-Haugen bill on their agricultural and Northwestern behalf, they will in multitudes conclude that they might just as well cease to look to either of the two old parties for "relief."

The regular old-line politicians in Congress are aware of this fact. They are aware also of the genuine woes of the Northwest. They are humanly sympathetic toward the Northwest. They are also politically afraid of it. Yet in many cases they are even more afraid of the provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill.

This bill, according to the report made upon it by Mr. Haugen himself, would increase the income of our farmers by one billion dollars a year. It would accomplish this feat through a governmental corporation empowered and ordered to purchase certain basic agricultural commodities at an increased "ratio price." The consumers would have to pay this price. Through governmental action one billion additional dollars a year would be taken away from the consumers and given to the producers. The cost of living for the general population of the country would be increased, according to Mr. Haugen's calculations, by 2½ per cent.

Mr. Haugen, in the presentation of his side of the case, has been scrupulously frank and fair. He claims simply that an increase of 2½ per cent in the cost of living is a small price to pay for arresting the ruin of a large part of our agricultural population.

Congress, however, representing cities as well as farms, and representing prosperous farmers as well as impoverished farmers, hesitates to pay the price. If the McNary-Haugen bill passes, it will be only by the greatest possible parliamentary good luck.

If it does not pass, then multitudinous Northwesterners will send delegates to the third-party convention at St. Paul on June 17 with fire and blood in their eyes.

This Congress began its singing on notes of sufficient troublesomeness. Its swan song, however, no matter which way it sings it, seems likely to give it its real troubles.

The Church and War

By GLENN FRANK

THE central message of Christianity is not to be found in any social, economic, or political platform, but Protestantism is doomed if it keeps discreetly silent or indulges in merely amiable generalities about the moral issues of politics and industry, of war and peace. I am not a delegate to the conference, and, perhaps, have no right to inject myself into the discussion. But I should feel guilty of either intellectual blindness or intellectual cowardice if I attempted to discuss the present status of Protestantism and said nothing on the crucial matter of the church and its relation to war.

I believe that anything less than a clean and courageous cutting loose from the whole war business means at best a slow suicide for the church. The church cannot, as it did in the last war, make its God the ally alike of Pershing and of Hindenburg and bring Him back unsullied for worship in peace time. Ministers of God cannot turn themselves into hysterical press agents of generals in war time and expect men to take them seriously as authentic representatives of Jesus of Nazareth the day after the armistice.

We forget so easily! During the war our religious and secular press was filled with articles prophesying the vast spiritual uplift the war would bring to our civilization. Where are these fine dreams now? Can any honest observer contend that a single nation on earth has reaped a single lasting spiritual benefit from the war? The few moral disciplines we had built up before the war have been in many cases scrapped without apology. The politics that was to bring us back to normalcy has brought us back to corruption and the baldest sort of money-changing in the temple of government. This is not a partisan political statement. I am a Republican, although, I must admit, a Republican by ancestry and inertia. We have turned our backs upon every one of the things by which we gave a seeming spiritual sanction to war. Having stilled our consciences with the thought that we went to war to save the souls of men we have since the war trimmed our mission down to the smallest project of saving our own skins. Officially at least, we are now engaged in the high "spiritual" adventure of converting the United States into a sort of sheltered Shylock of the nations, whetting his knife and gloating over his pound of sovereignty.

The brutal truth is that from the beginning of time war never has stimulated, and to the end of time war never will stimulate, spirituality in anything or anybody. War is the utter negation of all that the religion of Jesus stands for. The state may spend its time dilly-dallying with the problem of war; the church dare not. If in the future the church is to be more than an exhorting ambulance-driver in world politics it must choose now between Jesus and the generals.

It is so easy for the church to say that, as an organization, it will not bless any war, and then follow such an assertion with a weasel phrase such as "except wars of defense and wars waged in a righteous cause." As if any nation ever admitted that it fought a war that was not in self-defense or in a righteous cause! Personally I believe it is wiser for the church to remain silent on the subject of war until it is ready to speak with a sweeping courage that will mobilize the mind of the world against war. I see no point to a mere reaffirmation of the multiplication table.

I do not say that we may not find ourselves maneuvered into a position that will compel us to enter another war even within the lifetime of my generation. All I say is that if we find ourselves dragged into war by the stupidity or cupidity of political or industrial leadership, let us go into war honestly admitting that it is an ugly job that has been made necessary by stupidity and cupidity, and not insult the name and disgrace the church of Jesus of Nazareth by fooling ourselves into thinking that we are entering a spiritual crusade. Even a war waged for what appears a righteous cause is a spiritually destructive process.

Make no mistake. If the church says frankly and uncompromisingly that, as an organization, it will never sanction or take part in war, some semi-Christian laymen will withdraw their financial support from the church and its activities. But this should not, in my judgment, deter the church from taking this stand. The church could well afford to retrench on many of its official activities, if necessary, in order to free itself for the taking of a courageous step that would morally electrify the world. The church is not an end in itself; it is a means to an end. It must not allow the care of its machinery to steal away its strength from the serving of its deepest mission, the Christianization of human society, a thing that will remain impossible as long as churches sanction war.

Left and Right in the Needle-Trades Unions

By NATHAN FINE

THREE important conventions of the American needle-trades unions have recently been concluded and a new chapter written in the history of the most interesting and progressive labor organizations in the United States. The convention of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union was a jubilee to celebrate the achievements of a quarter of a century. Samuel Gompers brought the congratulations of the American Federation of Labor; telegrams came from the chiefs of practically every A. F. of L. union hailing the International as a progressive fighting organization. All of the former presidents of the union were there, and its tried friends such as Abraham Cahan of the Forward, Joseph Barondess, ex-Congressman Meyer London, Judge Jacob Panken, and Morris Hillquit, each in his own way recited the epic of the transformation, through the efforts of the union, of the lowly immigrant into a self-respecting and respected human being and industrial citizen.

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers also celebrated an anniversary, their tenth. They flung out their proud banners: "$100,000 to the Steel Workers in 1919," "The 44-hour Week in the Clothing Industry," "Amalgamated Banks in Chicago and New York," "Collective Agreements in the Principal Markets," "The Russian American Industrial Corporation, Our Contribution to Russia's Reconstruction," "Scientific Employment Bureau," "Unemployment Insurance." Though the Fur Workers' Union has only 11,000 members, while the International has about 100,000 and the Amalgamated 135,000, the little organization had fallen to 5,000 in 1922. So it too had cause to congratulate itself.

But these conventions were not merely love feasts. Serious conditions in the needle trades and disturbing internal problems had to be met. The agreements in the cloak industry of New York expire on June 1 of this year. Representatives of the International and of the three employers' associations have been conducting negotiations for months without result. Scattered and competing small contractors, taking orders from jobbers who are fast replacing the old manufacturers with their large and controllable inside shops, are juggling with the livelihood of the workers, jeopardizing every gain made by the union. The International has presented twelve demands calling upon the jobbers to guarantee wages and decent working conditions in the contractors' shops, and to give no work to contractors who employ less than fourteen operators. In addition the union, which has already won the 40-hour week in the dress trade, demands that due to the seasonal unemployment the cloak industry also shall work forty hours and do away with overtime as far as possible. It demands that the industry guarantee the workers a specific number of full weeks' employment during the year or payment of established wages for such a period, and, lastly, that the minimum wage rates be increased. The jobbers, on the other hand, demand "unlimited freedom of choice" in the selection and employment of contractors, subject only to the provision that the latter be under agreement with the union. In view of the breakdown of negotiations the 300 delegates to the International's convention unanimously authorized the General Executive Board to call a general strike if necessary.

The New York market has been one of the oldest and thorniest battle-grounds for the Amalgamated. They have no agreement with any association of employers. While the shops are numerous, few of them are large. The manufacturers have never recovered the trade they lost during the futile attempt to break the union by a 28-week lockout in 1920-1921. Hence the last two years have been marked by much unemployment, with the result that the local unions are not in a strong position financially. There is also a "left" and "right" controversy to complicate matters.

The delegates to all the conventions made plans to unionize the shops of the migratory "out-of-town" employer, who, with the assistance of small-town local authorities and the fear and ignorance of native workers, has managed to wriggle out of the control of the union.

The two big unions and the Furriers as usual voted generous sums to the auxiliary and relief organizations of the labor movement. The International and the Amalgamated declared for union life and health insurance, and the International decided to inaugurate a campaign to acquaint consumers with a new white sanitary label. The three organizations voted for extension of unemployment insurance and for the utmost local and national use of the facilities of their successful banks in New York and Chicago. The Furriers and the International will study plans for launching union-owned cooperative shops to set standards and stabilize conditions in their industries. The International voted $17,500 annually for the work of its educational department, while the Furriers' Union voted $2,000 toward its own educational work, which is also financed by the local unions.

Differences of opinion, sometimes heated, arose over some of these matters. But the conflict in the needle-trades unions—constantly smoldering underneath and frequently bursting out in the open—is not over organization problems. It is due to the bitter and persistent struggle between the left and the right. This cleavage is an aftermath of the war and of such events in the labor world as the capture of power by the Bolsheviks in Russia, the formation of the Communist International in 1919, the Red International of Labor Unions in 1920, and in the United States the organization of William Z. Foster's Trade Union Educational League in 1920, and of the Communist parties since 1919, including the Workers Party in 1921. Since these events there has been in the needle-trades unions, as in labor organizations throughout the world, a continuous battle. On one side stand the Communists and their sympathizers—the left. On the other are all those opposed to the Communists, the "pure and simple" and the "progressive" trade unionist, the syndicalist, the anarchist, and the socialist, constituting the right.

The program and tactics of the left and reciprocally of the right vary a bit from country to country, from one labor organization to another. The Jews and the Italians in the needle-trades unions may conduct the fight in a slightly more intense, persistent, open, and disturbing way than the "American" railroad workers. But far beyond any minor differences the left and the right almost literally cross swords over issues that have divided and still divide the labor movement throughout the world. A number of these issues came to the surface at the conventions of the needle-trades unions, particularly that of the International Ladies' Garment Workers', which unseated sixteen Communist delegates and drafted a new constitution, aimed, in part, to meet this very situation.

After the report of the credentials committee had been accepted by a vote of 4 to 1, unseating the delegates and placing Local 9, one of the International's largest unions, under the supervision of the General Executive Board for one year, President Morris Sigman declared that the masses of the workers must not be divided into different political factions which would prevent them from combining forces to bring about improvements in the industry. The General Executive Board of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers also has pointed out that internal difficulties in New York City, due to the fight of the left and the right, had absorbed much of the effort of the general office that could have been directed to more useful organization purposes.

The chiefs of the International, the Amalgamated, and the Fur Workers are in complete agreement that the dictation of outside organizations will not be tolerated. The General Executive Board of the Amalgamated has emphatically declared that the union "will not permit outside bodies—right, left, or otherwise—to transact business and make decisions for it. The Amalgamated must be its own master, responsible to its own membership, and must refuse to permit anyone to take over any part of its rights, functions, or powers." Israel Feinberg, manager of the New York Joint Board, the heart of the International, declared that outside organizations, if not checked, would destroy the unions as, he charged, they had done all over Europe.

The nature of the criticism leveled at the unions' administrative officers by the left is another source of dispute. The leaders demand that criticism and opposition be "civilized." For example, President Sigman referred to a cartoon in a Communist paper where he was pictured as "having a knife in one hand and a gun in the other," with a legend: "This is the symbol of the leadership of the International—Sigman." He charged that the left had acted on the doctrine that "nothing is dishonest as long as it is for the great cause." The delegates and the administration of the International went to the convention determined to render the opposition helpless. They refused to seat sixteen of fifty opposition delegates, and they adopted sections in their new constitution providing that members may be fined, suspended, or expelled, among other things, for belonging to any organization which tries to "interfere with the legitimate functions and rights" of the union. The union officials deny that they have ever conducted or intend starting an inquisition or that they have ever closed the door to criticism or opposition. But they are set on ending the present tactics of the left.

The lefts maintain that in order to bring about changes and elect officers who will carry out the Communist program, they must organize. There is no other way. If they are attached to the Trade Union Educational League, which the International has declared a dual organization, and hold caucuses to carry out the League program, on the other hand, they assert, the rights have always held caucuses and are in intimate touch with the Jewish Daily Forward and Socialist leadership. The lefts declare that the officials seek only to retain their jobs, move too cautiously, and have no courage. They must criticize them mercilessly and unmask them. The right leadership cannot and will not, they declare, give the rank and file the kind of organization which will be an effective instrument for the social revolution.

The Amalgamated convention took no action against the lefts. The general staff declared that the Amalgamated tolerated every divergent point of view. They all hoped that the membership would divide on organization issues and not on outside political matters. The Amalgamated is a friend of the Russian Soviet Republic, and it has declared in favor of one amalgamated union in the needle trades—the core of the Trade Union Educational League program. It decided to send delegates to the third-party convention at St. Paul on June 17, in which the Communists are represented, as well as to that of July 4, called by the more conservative Conference for Progressive Political Action. The constitution permits the shop delegates' system, another plank of the Educational League. The administration has refused to take sides, however, with either the right or the left.

The needle-trades unions have been the chief American center of the world-wide struggle between left and right unionists. There are signs that in Europe that struggle is slackening. The international secretariats, or federations of national unions in specific industries, have begun admitting the Russian Communist unions. The Red International of Labor Unions has not succeeded in winning many direct affiliations, and at its congress in Moscow in June the question of tactics will come up, and decisions may be reached which will lessen the tension in the needle-trades unions of the United States.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is not one of those persons who think that everyone is going to Europe this summer. He knows that the vast majority will stay here. Yet of those who stay many will leave their homes and search for change and excitement at Coney Island or Alaska or the Adirondacks or Lake Michigan or the Tennessee mountains. In summer, more than at any other time, man longs to be on the wing; his own front doorstep looks particularly tiresome when the weather is hot. When the Drifter reads, as he does now and then, of some old lady over ninety years old who has never been more than fifteen miles from the house in which she was born he is filled with amazement. He would like to know what tragedy kept her there, and whether her eyes did not watch after every wagon that passed her door. He pictures her rebellious at thirty because she has never been anywhere; dully resentful at forty; at fifty resigned to her fate; and at ninety dimly wondering why she had ever wished to move.

* * * * *

ON the excursion boat plying between New York City and Atlantic Highlands he once met a young woman who had taken her fate in her own hands. The daughter of an innkeeper in a small up-State town, she had spent twenty-two years of her life listening to the conversation of travelers, persons who had just left somewhere and were on their way somewhere else, and she herself had never been outside of her own village. "Why," she said earnestly, "I've never been on a boat before; not even a rowboat. I've never been twenty-five miles from my own house. I've never been anywhere. And a week from today I'm going to Paris for a year!"

* * * * *

THIS young woman, with admirable courage and foresight, had evidently seen herself as a woman of ninety who had never left her home, and she was determined to avert such an end. She did not, of course, realize how fortunate she was never to have been anywhere until she was adult enough to appreciate fully the romance of going. The Drifter's parents were shortsighted if well-meaning persons, and they took him on train journeys at such a tender age that he cannot remember the first one. He remembers very well, however, coming into New York harbor for the first time, at the age of sixteen; the harbor has never since looked as it did then. It was not the place he had left two weeks before on a train; it was a strange city, inexplicably desirable, to which he was returning after a long trip on a boat. He had become a traveler, a seasoned veteran who had been somewhere on a ship, and yet even he was probably too young to realize how important a moment it was.

* * * * *

THERE ought, evidently, to be a law forbidding persons to leave their homes until they are twenty-five years old, and forbidding them to remain within two thousand miles of it for five years after that time. For the pampered little children who are dragged off to Europe at seven and who spend the winter in Florida at ten the Drifter has only sympathy. They will never remember their first ocean voyage, their first taste of salt water (or be surprised, like a young Illinois friend of the Drifter, to find it salty); the details of their first sight of Paris will be vague or lost to them. They should have stayed at home, preparing for romance.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Nation at Northwestern

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My son is a Northwestern student at Evanston, an ex-service man, and an officer in the reserve corps of the United States army. When I spoke to him of the thirty-eight pacifist students he spat venom like a snake and said they should be kicked off the campus. I kept still because I dared do nothing else. But I thought of those Quaker forebears of mine and his who, in the seventeenth century, crossed the Atlantic in a sailing vessel and endured cruel hardships to preserve their right to their religious belief, which was peace.

I called to see my son the morning the issue of The Nation for April 16 was received. The first thing he said was: "Mother, have you read the hellish article in The Nation about Northwestern University?" Then we went to Lunt Library to get their copy and found it gone. Inquiry proved that President Scott had telephoned for it to be sent to his office. It was later returned to the library.

Now is there a concerted effort on the part of all the big colleges to mold opinion in this way? If so, and if it should be continued for a few generations, it would produce a nation of puppets. I am sorry that my son ever went to Northwestern University.

I wish to thank you again for saying what you thought. You must not worry about your subscription list.

Chicago, Illinois, April 23

A PACIFIST MOTHER

Returns from Oberlin

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A very significant act in the history of Oberlin College took place on the evening of May 13, when in their mock National Republican Convention, the student delegates nominated for President, Senator William E. Borah on the fourth ballot. The vote on the first ballot was as follows: Coolidge, 237; Borah, 234; Pinchot, 229; La Follette, 67; Johnson, 72. The fourth ballot showed: Coolidge, 352; Borah, 478; Pinchot, 11, and La Follette and Johnson each 1. The vote for Vice-President resulted in the nomination of Governor Pinchot, who received 680 votes to 125 for Senator Frank B. Willis.

On the previous evening a very progressive platform was adopted in which the most important planks favored the war referendum, the World Court, general reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements and products, and the immediate recognition of Russia. The amendment for the recognition of Russia carried by a vote of 597 to 241. However, an amendment favoring granting immediate independence to the Filipinos was badly snowed under. But waiving the Filipino question, there was a decided victory for the progressives. The next generation isn't going to be so blamed conservative, after all, it seems to me.

Oberlin, Ohio, May 17

PAUL L. CARPENTER

Taking Them Young

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps you will be interested in a few significant facts about National Boys' Week, a nation-wide celebration staged under the auspices of the Rotary Clubs which reached its climax on May 1 with loyalty parades of school-children in many cities. Approximately 2,500 Enid school boys were assembled on West Broadway here for a march around the public square. Twenty or thirty Rotarians acted as marshals, practically all of them being pocket editions of George F. Babbitt. Not understanding the real purpose of the parade, I ventured up to a Rotarian and asked what the real motive was in getting out so many school kids. "Oh," said he, "this is May Day. In Russia and other European countries the anarchists, reds, and Bolsheviks do their parading this day. We're taking the kids young and training them so when they grow up they'll hate all forms of radicalism and radicals—you know, men like La Follette, Brookhart, Wheeler, and that fellow, Magnus Johnson."

Enid, Oklahoma, May 3

ERNEST WILSON

Enslaving the German People

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Dawes plan appears to provide for the stabilization of the serfdom of the German people; it appears to involve the maintenance of a low standard of living for many years to come. It would carry one step further the advancement of American economic imperialism on the continent of Europe. Perhaps, as Mr. Bertrand Russell is I believe suggesting, the triumph of an American economic imperialism is desirable as the only way in which national rivalries can be ended, and the people, freed from the illusions which rival imperialisms foster, can be driven finally to assert themselves and win their way to freedom. However, Mr. Russell's proposition is no doubt arguable, and I do not suppose that you commend the adoption of the Dawes plan on such grounds as these.

Is not Scott Nearing's argument that the economic serfdom of the German people will result in a lowering of the status of the people in other industrial states a sound one?

Calgary, Alberta, May 3

W. NORMAN SMITH

International Relations Section

The Gandhi of the Balkans

By EMIL LENGYEL

ON May 6 Stephen Radich, Croatian peasant leader, issued a proclamation from his exile in Vienna, addressed to the Croatian people, in which he restated his party's program for the democratization of the Balkans. In it he turns against the monarchical form of government in Yugoslavia and advocates the establishment of a republic; and at the same time he calls upon the peasants and laborers of his country to unite their forces in an effort to liberate Yugoslavia from the rule of autocracy.

This proclamation marks a new phase in the career of the peasant leader who for the last six years has been the object of a campaign of calumny on the one hand and of an almost religious worship on the other. Ecce the Anti-Christ! has been the war cry of Radich's political opponents, while hundreds of thousands of Croatian peasants have seen in him the descendant in direct line of the apostles of early Christendom who came to purge the world of the sin of autocratic paganism.

Stephen Radich is the leader of Yugoslavia's second greatest political party, the Croatian Republican Peasant-Party. He had been active in Croatian politics prior to the war when his country belonged to Hungary and had made a name as an uncompromising champion of civic liberties. His decisive influence on the destinies of the Croatian people did not make itself felt until the termination of hostilities in 1918; from that time on he became more and more absorbed in the moral aspects of the movement of liberation, the aim of which was to make Croatia an autonomous state instead of a vassal of Greater Serbia. It was thus that Radich, the intellectual, became the idol of the illiterate Croatian peasant masses.

When Croatia became part of Yugoslavia, after severing her relations with Hungary, Radich's peasant party, politically inexperienced though it was, made a surprisingly good showing by obtaining 49 seats in the Yugoslav legislature. When, despite all efforts of the Croatian Peasant Party and of the other separatist forces, Yugoslavia became a centralized state with practically no autonomy for its component parts, Radich decided to adopt a policy of non-cooperation. His reason for not going into the Belgrade Parliament was that the "Yugoslav Constituent Assembly had been deprived of its sovereignty since it was not permitted to discuss the question whether a federal or centralized form of government or whether monarchy or republic would have been preferable for the country." The Peasant Party from the outset advocated the federalization of the Yugoslav state with extensive autonomous powers for both Croatia and Slovenia. At the same time, it has advocated, at least on behalf of Croatia, the republican form of government as opposed to the present monarchy.

At the last election, Radich's Peasant Party obtained the majority of parliamentary seats in Croatia and thereby became the second greatest party in the Skupstchina. Despite the overwhelming victory of his group, Radich decided to continue the policy of non-cooperation and passive resistance. He inaugurated in Croatia an intensive campaign against what he calls the autocratic methods of the Pachich regime, which in the disguise of the government of the "Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes" has been carrying on the private business of the former Kingdom of Serbia. This period was the most important part of the political evolution of the Croatian peasant leader. His outlook became broader. Instead of narrow nationalistic doctrines to which the people of the Balkans have been accustomed in the past he preached non-violence, cooperation of the peasants with the laborers, the pacification of the Balkan Peninsula, and the reaching of an understanding between Yugoslavia and her neighbors. He could not carry on his work very long unmolested because his doctrines were found "subversive to the kingdom," and the Government of M. Pachich decided to adopt drastic measures against him. But before these measures could be made effective he disappeared from Croatian territory. A few days after his disappearance newspaper dispatches told of his arrival in England. This news was followed by an indignant attack of the Yugoslav authorities upon the English consular officers in Agram whom they charged with having helped the peasant leader to escape.

For some time Radich stayed in England seemingly out of touch with his adherents, creating the impression that he had retired from active participation in Yugoslav affairs. Much to the surprise of the uninitiated, he left England about four months ago and went to Vienna. His arrival there was considered as one of the most significant events in contemporary Yugoslav history. The importance attached to his reappearance near his native country was justified when it became known that in Vienna Radich revised his former policy of abstention from Yugoslav parliamentary life. He determined to carry the policy of non-cooperation into the Yugoslav Parliament itself. His idea was to have his party return to the Skupstchina, to disrupt the present regime of Pachich, to take over the government, and to have the constitution revised in a legal way by putting the country on a federal basis and holding a plebiscite to determine whether the people wanted a monarchical or a republican form of government. Even in the Parliament he was prepared to deny the existence of the Yugoslav state as it was constituted, and to withhold cooperation from the authorities whose offices were created by the act of union.

With this program, the Croatian Peasant Party returned to the Skupstchina. The immediate result of their appearance was the overturn of the Pachich regime. It became automatically a minority government facing a majority opposition which was overwhelmingly in favor of a revision of the constitution, of the erection of a federal state, and which leaned toward the republican form of government. M. Pachich had to resign from the premiership which he had held for years. He succeeded a few days later in forming a new government by causing the defection from the opposition of the right wing of the Democratic Party consisting mostly of members of the former Croatian Coalition Party. This faction was headed by Pribitchevich, a politician of no caliber. Unfortunately for the Government, this Pachich-Pribitchevich combination was very short lived. As more and more Radich adherents came into the Parliament, the majority of the coalition government turned again into a minority. On April 12, last, M. Nicolai Pachich, Prime Minister, tendered his resignation to the King, suggesting that the Parliament be dissolved and a new election held.

The situation thus created is one which is unique in the history of Yugoslavia, since the present parliamentary majority is hostile to the state whose government, according to parliamentary tradition, it would be called upon to take over. The very group upon whom the formation of the new government would be incumbent consists of parties which, for different reasons, are opposed to a centralized Yugoslavia. King Alexander and his councillors seem to be inclined to frustrate the attempt of the opposition at having the constitution rewritten; they succeeded in having Pachich resume the responsibilities of government until after the election, thus giving him the opportunity of influencing the votes of those whom, as conditions are in the Balkans, the government authority can reach. The reluctance of the King to ask Radich or any other federalist leader of the erstwhile opposition to form the new government is all the more natural since King Alexander is aware of the fact that such a government would be likely to advocate the abolition of the monarchy.

The same reactionary forces which made Radich leave his country are bending every effort to have him expelled from Austria. It was due to their insistence that the Austrian Government during the early part of May advised the peasant leader to leave the Austrian republic. Radich refused to follow this advice. His answer, which was incorporated into an official protocol, is significant. In an interview granted to the Vienna paper, Die Stunde, he summed the situation up as follows:

I have noted the advice of the Austrian Government, but I can not follow it since I have been urged emphatically by my followers to stay near them for reasons of political expediency. I shall not go away from Austria unless the Government of the republic expels me by force. Before I came to Austria I obtained an assurance through the Austrian minister in London that I would be permitted to live here in peace and freedom. I expected to be left in peace, all the more since it is known that the policy I am advocating is purely pacifistic and not at all revolutionary. In my opinion, the demand of the Yugoslav authorities encroaches upon the sovereign rights of Austria since it is only the Austrian Government that is competent to determine whether I may stay in this country or not. The demand is at the same time an affront against the Yugoslav parliamentary majority, nay, against the whole nation that I am representing. Let us assume that the Austrian Government complies with the request of the Yugoslav authorities and expels me. What will happen if the former opposition in Yugoslavia, whose leader I am, forms the next government and I return to my country as Prime Minister? I have always known that Austria had a conservative government but I have not realized that they were reactionaries.

Radich deprecates violence under all circumstances. He made it clear that he intended to carry out his program without encroaching upon the rights of those whose political opinion was opposed to his. This program provides first of all for the decentralization of the Kingdom of the Yugoslavs and the granting of autonomy to the Croats and Slovenes. Subsequently, a plebiscite would have to decide the form of government. The democratization of the system of land-ownership and agrarian reform in Croatia and Slovenia would be the next step. The Croatian peasant leader is in favor of a semi-individualistic, semi-communistic form of land-ownership, the so-called zadruga. Under this system the community owns the land but the individual lessees can dispose of it within certain limits. The system as elaborated by Radich would prevent the accumulation of great landed properties; at the same time, it would make the ownership of the land by the community as little onerous as possible for the individuals, inaugurating a method of "invisible" community control.

In external politics Radich's Peasant Party stands for the immediate recognition of the Russian Soviet Government. In an interview printed in a number of Croatian papers Radich quoted several reasons for his attitude toward Russia. It is characteristic of his mental make-up that the main reason he mentions is the acknowledgment of the fact that the "dictatorship of the peasants as demonstrated in Russia insures ultimately the stability of the peasant democracy." In the opinion of M. Radich "the right of self-determination for which I have been fighting is recognized in Russia," so that he finds it natural that the Slav nations following the same ideals, differing only in the methods of their execution, should live on friendly terms with each other.

Stephen Radich is mindful of the disastrous role the Balkans have played. Yet he knows that able leadership and the creation of an atmosphere of good-will could remove the causes of conflict which for the last decades have made the Balkans the sorest spot of Europe. He has set out to liberate his country from the shackles of an undesired dependence upon another country. He wishes to put the relations of the peoples inhabiting the Balkans on a basis which is equitable for all of them. Instead of conjuring up chaos in the Southeastern part of Europe, as his political opponents pretend, Radich has embarked upon a campaign of liberation whose ultimate result, he hopes, will be the pacification of the Balkan Peninsula.

The Russian Unions Defend the Revolution

IN connection with the conference now in progress in London between representatives of the Soviet Government headed by Christian Rakovsky and the British Government, a memorandum of the British bankers on the question of Russian debts and trade relations between Great Britain and the Soviet Union was made public. The memorandum was timed with the opening of the negotiations on April 14 and was presumably meant to influence the deliberations of the conference and to impress the Soviet delegation with the need of compromise. The labor organizations in the USSR immediately retorted to this memorandum with a vehement declaration demanding and supporting a firm attitude on the part of the Soviet Government and the Soviet delegation in their dealings with Great Britain. The declaration was published in the Moscow press of April 24.

The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions, after a joint session with the central committees of the industrial unions, addressed the praesidium of the Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissars of the USSR with an exposition of their attitude toward the memorandum of the English bankers.

The English bankers demand, as a condition for granting credits to the Union of Soviet Republics, the recognition of state and private debts on the part of the Soviet Government. The debts of the Czarist Government and of the Kerensky Government are considerable. Their recognition would load the toiling masses with a heavy burden which would reduce the condition of the workers and peasants of the Soviet Union to that of Chinese coolies. The workers and peasants of our country did not throw off the yoke of the Russian landlords and capitalists in order to become the slaves of the London and Paris stock exchanges. We repudiate this demand vigorously not only in defense of the interests of the workers and peasants of the Soviet republics but also of the interests of the toiling masses of all countries. The saddling of the workers and peasants of the Union with this burden would lead toward a mass emigration which would endanger the standard of life of the workers of other countries.

The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions repudiates the recognition of the war debts; the toiling masses of the USSR cannot be forced to pay interest on loans with the aid of which foreign capital dragged Russia into a war which cost it millions of victims and destroyed the economic life of the country. The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions expresses its deep indignation at the forgetfulness of the English bankers concerning the harm caused the Soviet Union by the policy of intervention which gives us every ground to demand of the Soviet Government the advancement of counter-claims against the defenders of the intervention—the English and French bankers.

The attitude of the All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions on the transactions concerning other debts is as follows:

1. The toiling masses of the Soviet Union cannot assume heavier obligations than are compatible with the development of the country and with those problems of economic reconstruction which the Union must carry out. Only when the English financial world shall grant the Soviet republics credits for the acceleration of their economic reconstruction can the proposition be considered that part of the toil of the peoples of the USSR should go toward the payment of interest on debts which must be reduced to conform with the capacity of the country. The plundering of the resources of the USSR, which is the aim of the English bankers, would make the growth of Anglo-Russian trade impossible and must certainly bring untold harm to both countries.

2. The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions protests vigorously against any talk of returning private property to foreign capitalists. The toiling masses of the Soviet Union achieved in the October Revolution the abolition of private ownership of the means of industrial production. The capitalists of England failed in their attempt to wrest these means of production from the hands of the toiling masses of the Union by intervention. The workers of the Union fought with arms in their hands for the possession of the mines, coal pits, railways, banks. For only through the possession of these means of production could they free themselves from the poverty to which they had been reduced by the Russian bourgeoisie, the Czarist regime, and international capital. All over the world the workers hailed with enthusiasm this achievement of the Russian workers. The demand of the English bankers that Soviet Russia should relinquish the gains of its struggle is a slap in the face of the organized workers of the whole world.

If the English capitalists desire to repair their losses, let them work on the basis of the laws of the USSR, on the principle of concessions. The former private owners may in such cases be granted priority provided all other conditions are equal. The demand of guaranties that in the future private property in the Soviet republics shall under no circumstances be in danger of confiscation is ridiculous. Such guaranties as the English capitalists demand could not be given by the British Government. The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions stands firmly on the basis of the new economic policy, which is striving to attract foreign capital for the development of the productive forces of the Soviet republics. The interests of the Soviet Union are a sufficient guaranty that no measures will be adopted which might frighten off the intelligent groups of international capital from work in the Union.

3. The All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions repudiates vigorously the demand of the English capitalists for full freedom of economic transactions with private concerns in the Union states. This demand means the abolition of the foreign-trade monopoly, it means full freedom of profiteering. Should this demand be granted it would lead to the destruction of the Russian state industry. This demand is only an attempt to turn the Soviet Union into a colony for international capital. The working class of the Soviet republics will never agree to this. The monopoly of foreign trade and the Soviet state control of our economic life are the pledge that our country will never again become the victim of the chaos which is reigning in the capitalist countries and which brought on the World War.

4. The English bankers threaten that British capital will boycott the Soviet Union should the latter not agree to their demands. These threats do not frighten the toiling masses. Without the aid of foreign capital the Soviet Union, though slowly, will still reconstruct its economic life with its own means. From a financial boycott on the part of the English bankers British business will be the first to suffer. As a matter of course there would in this case be no talk of granting concessions to English capitalists on favorable terms and British industry would receive no orders from Russia—orders which are sorely needed for the struggle against unemployment in England and which, with the development of the economic life of Russia, could grow in volume every year.

Thus declaring its point of view the All-Russian Central Council of the Trade Unions expressed its firm conviction that the delegation of the USSR, which has among its members the representatives of a number of trade unions, will not retreat a step before the pressure of the English bankers, and that the English workers, though they are not yet the masters of their country, will find the ways for the economic rapprochement of both countries so greatly needed for the establishment of peace and for the overcoming of economic chaos.

The declaration was signed by the central committees of the following unions:

METAL WORKERS, MINERS, TEXTILE WORKERS, RAILWAY WORKERS, CHEMICAL WORKERS, TYPOGRAPHICAL TRADES, FOOD WORKERS, BUILDING TRADES, LEATHER WORKERS, PEOPLE'S COMMUNICATION, WATER TRANSPORT WORKERS, LAND AND LUMBER WORKERS, PAPER WORKERS, WOOD WORKERS, SUGAR WORKERS, SOVIET EMPLOYEES, COMMUNAL EMPLOYEES, MEDICAL AND SANITATION WORKERS, LOCAL TRANSPORT WORKERS, NEEDLE TRADES, PEOPLE'S FEEDING, EDUCATIONAL WORKERS, ART WORKERS.

White Australia, by G. C. T. Giles, a discussion of Australia's attitude toward immigration and Japanese exclusion, will appear in the International Relations Section in an early issue.

The Nation

Vol. CXVIII, No. 3074

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 1924

THE SOUL OF SAMUEL PEPYS

Gamaliel Bradford

"A book of the highest value to Pepys lovers. No one who knows his Pepys can afford to miss it. . . . Thoroughly understanding and sympathetic."
—N. Y. Times. Illus. $3.50

NOTABLE NEW BOOKS

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF EMILY DICKINSON

Martha Dickinson Bianchi

"One of the most original poets, one of the subtlest, most suggestive letter-writers that this country has produced."
—Gamaliel Bradford. Illus. $4.00

A MERCHANT'S HORIZON

A. Lincoln Filene

Shows what can be accomplished by employers who aim at democracy and efficiency in business, and discusses profit-sharing, labor troubles, shop councils, pensions, etc. $2.50

MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

E. B. Hill

Traces the development of French music from Chabrier and Faure to Erik Satie and "the group of six," and presents the personalities and aims of the leaders. $4.00

JUSTIN S. MORRILL

Wm. B. Parker

The life and public services of the author of the Morrill Tariff and the Land Grant Colleges Act, involving a review of our history for more than half a century. Illus. $5.00

A SACHEL GUIDE TO EUROPE

Rolfe and Crockett

The forty-fourth edition of the indispensable guide to Europe thoroughly revised and brought to date with much additional material.

Cloth, $4.00; leather, $5.00

MY BOOK AND HEART

Corra Harris

"If an autobiography of greater charm or more poignant beauty has been written in many seasons I haven't run across it. . . . A thing of beauty that defies description."—Toledo Blade. Illus. $3.00

ANDORRA

Isabelle Sandy

One of the most highly praised of recent French novels. $2.00

CREOLE SKETCHES

Lafcadio Hearn

Characteristic sketches of life in New Orleans. Illus. $2.00

UNDER DISPUTE

Agnes Repplier

New papers by a master of the art of essay writing. $2.00

BENJAMIN CONSTANT

E. Schermerhorn

A brilliant French statesman and man of letters, lover of Mme. de Stael and Mme. Recamier. $5.00

WILLIAM BLAKE

S. Foster Damon

A new interpretation of his philosophy and symbols. Edition limited to 750 copies. Illus. $10.00

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN

J. A. Spender

A definitive biography, illuminating recent British political history. Illus. 2 vols. $10.00

If you are interested in books and the men and women who write them, we invite you to sign and mail this coupon.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY
2 Park Street, Boston, Mass.

Please send me, without charge, The Piper, a periodical devoted to books and their authors.

Name

Address

SOCIAL POLITICS IN THE UNITED STATES

Fred E. Haynes

Shows the part played by social and economic factors in our politics from the time of Jefferson to the present day. $3.50

GEORGE III AND THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Frank A. Mumby

"A most interesting and vivid description of a stirring period of English history."—Boston Transcript. Illus. $5.00

DEMOCRACY AND LEADERSHIP

Irving Babbitt

Will American democracy be fatal to liberty and lead to a decadent imperialism? A new book by the author of "Rousseau and Romanticism." $3.00

COLONIAL WOMEN OF AFFAIRS

E. A. Dexter

A book of fascinating and authentic information in regard to women's activities in the American Colonies. Lavishly illustrated. $5.00

AFRICAN CLEARINGS

J. K. Mackenzie

"Miss Mackenzie presents in her inimitable simplicity of style the very color of African life. She shows the natives as they really are."—Philadelphia Ledger. $2.50

MACMILLAN BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING

Ernest Poole*The Avalanche*

A NEW NOVEL

The clash of ideals and the struggle between love and ambition form the crux around which is woven an absorbing novel. A brilliant young doctor and a restless and excitement-loving New York society girl find romance in a strange manner. $2.00

May Sinclair*The Dark Night*

A NEW NOVEL

An exquisite lyrical quality is added to Miss Sinclair's usual tremendous force and vividness of style in this new novel. It is a keen and poignant study of the sacrifice of a great love. $2.00

H. G. Wells*The Dream*

A NEW NOVEL

Sensational in the presentation of its plot, romantic in its love story and humorous and daring in its philosophy. "As good as anything that Mr. Wells has done, and there can hardly be higher praise. It is an absorbing novel written with a power that shows no signs of flagging."—New York Times. $2.50

Charles H. McIlwain*The American Revolution*

A CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION

The Pulitzer Prize of $2,000 has been awarded to this book as the best one of the year on the history of the United States. "This book has done well what it set out to do. A scholarly and able study."—Professor McLaughlin, Chicago University. $2.25

Andrew W. Mellon Taxation: The People's Business

A NEW TREATMENT

The Secretary of the Treasury presents the complex subject of taxation in the light of underlying principles. Simple, clear-cut, non-technical. $1.25

At all bookstores or from

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

64-66 Fifth Avenue

New York

Summer Book Section

Poems by Carl Sandburg

Bug Spots

This bug carries spots on his back.
Last summer he carried these spots.
Now it is spring and he is back here again
With a domino design over his wings.
All winter he has been in a bedroom,
In a hole, in a hammock, hung up, stuck away,
Stashed while the snow blew over,
The wind and the dripping icicles,
The tunnels of the frost.
Now he has errands again in a rotten stump.

Winter Gold

The same gold of summer was on the winter hills, the oat straw gold, the gold of slow sun change.

The stubble was chilly and lonesome, the stub feet clomb up the hills and stood.

The flat cry of one wheeling crow faded and came, ran on the stub gold flats and faded and came.

Fade-me, find-me, slow lights rang their changes on the flats of oat straw gold on winter hills.

Moist Moon People

The moon is able to command the valley tonight.
The green mist shall go a-roaming, the white river shall go a-roaming.
Yet the moon shall be commanding, the moon shall take a high stand on the sky.

When the cats crept up the gullies,
And the goats fed at the rim a-laughing,
When the spiders swept their rooms in the burr oaks,
And the katydids first searched for this year's accordions,
And the crickets began a-looking for last year's concertinas,

I was there, I saw that hour, I know God had grand intentions about it.
If not, why did the moon command the valley, the green mist and white river go a-roaming, and the moon by itself take so high a stand on the sky?
If God and I alone saw it, the show was worth putting on,
Yet I remember others were there, Amos and Priscilla,
Axel and Hulda, Hank and Jo, Big Charley and Little Morningstar,
They were all there; the clock ticks spoke with castanet clicks.

Man and Dog on an Early Winter Morning

There was a tall slough grass
Too tough for the farmers to feed the cattle,
And the wind was sifting through, shaking the grass;
Each spear of grass interfered a little with the wind
And the interference sent up a soft hiss,
A mysterious little fiddler's and whistler's hiss;
And it happened all the spears together
Made a soft music in the slough grass
Too tough for the farmers to cut for fodder.

"This is a proud place to come to
On a winter morning, early in winter,"
Said a hungry man, speaking to his dog,
Speaking to himself and the passing wind,
"This is a proud place to come to."

Monkey of Stars

There was a tree of stars sprang up on a vertical panel of the south.

And a monkey of stars climbed up and down in this tree of stars.

And a monkey picked stars and put them in his mouth, tall up in a tree of stars shining in a south sky panel.

I saw this and I saw what it meant and what it means was five, six, seven, that's all, five, six, seven.

Oh hoh, yah yah, loo loo, the meaning was five, six, seven, five, six, seven.

Panels of changing stars, sashes of vapor, silver tails of meteor streams, washes and rockets of fire—

It was only a dream, oh hoh, yah yah, loo loo, only a dream, five, six, seven, five, six, seven.

Bitter Summer Thoughts—No. 3

Firecrackers came from China.

Watermelons came from Egypt.

The horses of the sun hoist their heads and nicker at the fence where the first old evening stars fish for faces.
And the light of the eyes of a child at a morning window calling to an early morning snow this too is a stranger among strangers.

The splendors of old books may be counted.

The spears of brass lights, shining in the dawn of the tugboats and warehouses, throw other splendors.

Yet a corn wind is in my ears, a rushing of corn leaves swept by summer, it is in my ears, the corn wind.

Harry Hansen: Reviewer of Books

By HARRY HANSEN

HARRY HANSEN'S name may serve simply to recall the fact that at one time the Scandinavians settled in the midlands, and that its bearer descended from them, and still lives there. His function is to review books, and reviewers, it is well known, are a low sort of folk who don't know enough to become authors, and who don't know enough authors to become publishers. Their opinions, anonymously ascribed to the Butte Bugle, the Kokomo Clarion, and the Kalamazoo Gazette, rise in a sort of nebulous mist from the miasma of advertisements, and tell of books of "sheer, poignant beauty," "thrilling heart interest," "gripping plots," "masterly depiction of character," and "marvelous descriptive passages." Publishers regard them as a bunch of college freshmen who may be propitiated by the gift of a book now and then; to critics they are anathema, the reminders of a misspent youth; to authors they are the scum of the earth, fit only to be shot, as most of them would be if authors were not a gentle folk who go about unarmed.

A critic may be anything he wishes, but a reviewer possesses no charter to be anything more than an interpreter and an announcer of books. A critic may write purely to entertain himself—the auto-esoteric function, I believe it is called—or to impress other critics with his learning, or, in the spirit of an evangelist, to announce the truth and elevate the lowly to his level. But a reviewer wastes good white space unless he remembers that he must be understood equally well in Central Park West and the wilds of Flatbush, on Halsted Street and the Lake Shore Drive. The critic may be aloof, leisurely; he may read his author in the quiet of the veranda of his country estate; he may take three days to consult collateral reviews in the London prints and reverse himself five days before publication without losing caste, but the reviewer must read as he runs, shouting his opinions amid the din of ponderous presses; he must speak not for himself and to himself but to others; he must discard the elusive phrase, the recondite allusion, the reference skilfully culled from erudite authors; he must forego the joy of feeding his vanity by being seen in public with his scholarly loves.

Sad, indeed, the plight of the reviewer. To those who affect culture he is journalistic and gossipy, to those who work with their hands he is literary and highbrow. He subordinates his individual taste in a mass of miscellaneous reading which overstocks his brain with unrelated facts and ideas without adequately filling one compartment. Books pile up about him like cheeses on the Edam market; he advances timorously and appraises them—books on pulp paper, born obscurely in the back of a printer's shop; books issued by substantial houses, heralded by generous campaigns of advertising; books written by established authors to defray the expenses of another motor; books recommended by Brander Matthews; books written by friends—good friends, who will stick by you through thick and thin, at least until you have printed your review.

Books as news—that is the slogan which has guided many in that increasing army of reviewers for American newspapers. It presupposes that readers are interested in a reflection of life, an illusory world just beyond their petty day. It ignores aesthetics and elevates "heart interest," it recognizes the emotional life, and gives precedence to books that discuss the topics of the hour. But although Hansen adheres to the tenet that books must be treated as news he has his own interpretation of that misguided phrase. Does it mean that anything written by socially prominent authors, whether artistry or hash, must be greeted with salaams? Does it call for an endless summary of ancient plots, on the theory that no story is so old that it is not new to somebody by next sun-up? Does it mean that the reviewer must breathe life into the tale of the heroine who flees with her babe across the ice, or the hero who rescues the daughter of culture from the clutches of land-grabbing villains? These, too often, are tales meant for "the average man." The reviewer has but one yardstick: the greatest good to the greatest number.

During the war Hansen was a correspondent: after the peace he came back and stepped, appropriately enough, into the so-called din of ideas. Chicago was his stamping-ground and the broad acres just beyond the grimy smokestacks were the fields of his hopes. Ideas and books were in the air, drawn from those homely acres, and not, thank heaven, smuggled past the customs from a transatlantic liner. But the trail of men and ideas led to New York, and he followed it like the farmer who follows the wheat to the mill. Here, after all, was the literary mart. Boston was seductive and leisurely, and meant warm fires and gentle talk of biography and reminiscence, but New York was a babel where men displayed their ivory, apes, and peacocks; they knew little of the hinterland save as a market for their wares; most of them considered it backward in matrimony and bathtubs, and New York tolerated only those of its émigrés that had become legitimized by residence on Manhattan. Here Hansen followed the book on its intricate journey from the author's kitchenette on West Tenth Street to the bookstore on the Avenue. He listened to lofty talk about themes and ideas, format and cover design, original cost and overhead, outright and royalties, and strange technical terms rioted in his mind as he captured the new occupational vernacular: imprint, loose sheets, overstocked, reprint, monograph, plug, screed, anthology, series, budget, and kindred words.

And here, too, he suffered a lasting disillusionment. For he had come prepared to think of books as emanations from the brains of men of creative energy and noble impulses, as part of the heart and the soul and the spirit. Now he learned that this book was the product of envy, written to confute a rival, and that the product of expedience, written to capture the popular ear. This sketch, by a comely young woman, was printed by the publisher who was the victim of his own sophistication, and that, a harmless bit of verse, saw daylight because the publisher's wife could not well be denied. This reminiscent romance was the tenth attempt of the lionized author to make the public pay for his servants and his wines; that ponderous volume of edited letters was the final wreath laid by an estate on a long-forgotten grave. The other side, too, he learned: how men in publishing offices scanned the horizon eagerly for new arrivals, how every manuscript was seized upon in the hope of fulfilment of the eternal promise; how this author had been paid a pension for years in the assurance that he would eventually come through; how that ancient had been given ease and comfort that he might add the final page to a valiant essay, never marketable, yet always memorable. This was the kindlier side; he cherished its discovery.

In his early days Hansen was given to expressing his views bluntly; today he is wiser. "Have you seen our new book by Plankington?" asked the publisher, reaching for a box of havanas. "No," admitted Hansen, "but the London Times calls it a washout." "Baker & Taylor ordered 500 before publication," continued the publisher, "and Gjerkins, of Sioux City, has just wired for an additional fifty of the first printing, for distribution in the cow country. Have you read our 'Madcap Mazie'?" "Yes," said Hansen, "but the illustrations belie the tale." "I'll admit the jacket was drawn two years ago for 'Columbine's Captive,'" said the publisher, "but the boys on the road are crazy about it, and we are now in the third printing." "I hear that Jonas, who writes sea tales, has never been to sea," Hansen ventured. "His apartment on the Drive is wet enough for our purpose," retorted the publisher.

Sometimes Hansen slipped unobtrusively into that confusing affair called a literary luncheon; here he beheld authors break bread with critics, and actresses converse amiably with managers. He learned that success and good looks do not always go together, that humorists are tired and dull and easily irritated, and writers of romance burdened with children and household cares. He observed that native culture was often despised when it came horny-handed, and loudly acclaimed as one of the seven lively arts when, diluted and devitalized, it reached the patter of the stage. Here and there obtruded the flavor of a foreign culture; he saw the rising mode of disillusion and ironical despair growing out of an intensely cultivated sophistication, and caught here and there the outcropping of a fashionable decadence, carefully nurtured in hothouse atmosphere by youths who tried hard to hide the straws that proved their nativity on Iowa farms. Now and then an ancient went by, representative of that puritanism which had taught the nation thrift, sobriety, and poise, and now, in senile decay, doing police duty on the last literary frontier.

When he returned to his native midlands Hansen was convinced that the city was inflated and insincere and that the land was wholesome. Exotic influences had not yet reached the West, writers were still turning virgin soil and producing a literature that owed nothing to other cultures. When it did not express the underlying puritanism it fought it without quarter, refusing to dismiss it with the ironical shrug of the city. The books that came out of this West had no resemblance to the products of Eastern sophistication; they had vitality, even when they lacked technique. Hansen realized that his task was to keep an open mind and to prepare a welcome for all new work. New products called for new labels—it was clearly outrageous to squeeze these books into ancient pigeon-holes called mid-Victorian, realistic, romantic, modern, satirical or younger generation, or bearing many similar devices invented by indolent minds to avoid thinking. A new nomenclature was needed to describe them. Likewise Hansen parted company with the stock phrases of his time—masterly, gripping, poignant, remarkable, amazing, powerful, engrossing, worth-while, dynamic—a motley, diffident, ineffective crew. And with them went the aroma of the stackroom: motif, sturm und drang, weltanschauung, milieu, mise en scene, denouement, logos, zeitgeist—for he remembered that he must cultivate a sixth sense, the sense for an audience, and that in his philosophy the unpardonable sin was to be misunderstood.

In his earliest reviews he stressed provincial merit, and wearing his emotions on the surface he acclaimed the newcomers widely. His Eastern friends smiled indulgently or reasoned with him: "How silly it is, my boy, all this babble about the Midwest—don't you know that Huysmans, Kuprin, De Maupassant, Kellermann have done the same thing so much better?" But one group never failed him—the publishers. They wrote him congratulatory letters and telegrams, remarking on his good sense and judgment, so rare in this land of literary tripe. They blazoned his remarks in advertising copy and named him a worthy rival of the Butte Bugle and the Kokomo Post-Express. Sometimes he was a bit confused because the compositor had used nothing but his adjectives, and once, when he had written: "As the story of the progress of a second-rate mind it is the most revealing book that we have ever read," he was a bit taken back to find himself saying, blandly: "It is the most revealing book that we have ever read." He had the feeling that he was ungrateful when he found himself becoming more and more restrained, and wondered whether his disuse of adjectives was a hint of approaching sterility. Even today, when the pale wraiths of his early oracular utterances rise from the pages of publishers' advertising and point a bony finger at him he quails, but acknowledges his guilt: "I said it once, and it will have to stand."

Hansen has not yet learned to let a book lie unopened or a paragraph unread. He hopes to find in each volume something of the joy of the creator in the act of creation, and acknowledges no schools or standards which deprive him from viewing each book as the expression of the artist's personal relation to life. Although in his first year he discovered four masterpieces, he still hopes in this, his fourth, to find the well-used word, the perfect phrase. He has not yet disciplined his emotions so thoroughly that he cannot rejoice at an author's success, or feel depressed at his failure. He loves the mechanics of bookmaking, and admires the well-cut font, the balanced page; similarly he finds happiness in proof of technical skill in writing, but this has never blinded him to the conviction that no amount of technique can offset the lack of virginity in thinking. He has committed himself irrevocably to the belief that the artist should write about life as he pleases and choose his materials where he finds them. He is wedded to the West because he understands it and he has faith in the ultimate emergence of its artists, because, after all, the potential strength of a land is never very far from the soil.

Epitaph

By ARTHUR GUITERMAN

Though all he craved was leave to work,
Though all he really loved was Beauty,
Yet still, because he couldn't shirk
What somehow seemed to be a duty,

He tried to scrub a black cat white,
He tried to lure a moth with camphor,
He fought an honest, hopeless fight
For things he didn't give a damn for.

The Two-Edged Sword

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

WE have our poetic five- and ten-cent stores where sharp tin similes and imitation-steel metaphors come bright from the factory, constantly offered and replenished. Into such a world, now and then, strides a poet with a Damascus blade, ancient and tempered, but with a newly ground edge that will part a silk tangle or cut yesterday's cobweb. This more powerful weapon is the use of the myth as a figure of speech.

The problem of the poet is always to say as much as possible by saying as little as possible. Now this is done in many ways, of the many music being perhaps the purest and most magical, and at the same time too simply lyrical to express entirely a civilization as complex as ours. The device of the myth, which uses the story in place of the mere metaphor, and brings the whole complexity of situation, persons, and action already familiar to bear upon the single point of a poem's mood, is far more formidable. Here is a delicate instrument, that comes alive in the proper hand. To my mind a literature of major significance is always in the offing when poets feel the need of this form and reach to recapture it. A swift, bold stroke and a lightness of touch combine to suit the needs of a teeming and wealthy age. This of course is no discovery. The old broadsword has been hanging on the wall since Milton's day.

But until a little while ago it seemed destined for the museum. The housewives of the free-verse rebellion objected to its historic mold. Classical and Biblical allusions, in that passionate housecleaning of everything unlawfully inherited, were taken as a mark of utter insincerity; American poets were given the choice of Pocahontas and Captain John Smith, or nothing. Now however dead the stories of Jacob and Esau, Orpheus and Orestes, may have been at that moment, the principals in the dumb-show of our sixth-grade history textbooks were much worse off, for as yet they were not even decently deceased, but wanderers in a middle-mist of folk-lore, neither dead nor alive, in a purgatory between symbol and reality. And so the only lore allowed us was not lore at all, and however obediently we evoked these familiars, and however much we wanted no other gods before them, we could do little more than beat the pretentious tom-tom.

In the meanwhile Miss Millay was using Persephone and Lesbia as though by prescriptive right, and Housman remembered Mithridates at a needful moment, and Hodgson made us a new Eve and a new serpent, tumbling in twenty rings into the grass. But these poems were treated as stepchildren and given only a bread-and-water recognition, until with a flourish of the well-worn weapon, T. S. Eliot wrote "Sweeney," "Burbank," and "The Wasteland."

However, the question becomes, now that we discover our right to two great sources of tradition, which of them best suits our temper. The Greek myths have suffered from their academic position; the Bible is equally insufferable from its constant association with Sunday school. Perhaps the fact that the ratio is 6:1, according to days spent in the study of profane and sacred history, has something to do with the latter's greater attraction for us, in spite of the penitential theological binding.

This is a fanciful reason, the real one being almost too trite to be attractive. But there is no denying that the Bible came over in the Mayflower, and went across the plains in covered wagons, with the plows and flint-lock rifles of those inescapable people, the pioneers. For three hundred years on this soil, and many more hundred on another, our evangelically minded ancestors have likened the events of their every-day lives to those of Daniel, Moses, and Isaac, Magdalen and Eve. Achilles has slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands. Abraham—Ezekiel—Jeremiah—the very names of the old Hebrew prophets have acquired a peculiarly American flavor. Our new poetry, I think, will come from this material of our old religion, and our new religion speak in the accents of our old poetry. The Bible, not Paul Bunyan or the Odyssey, is the great American folk literature.

Mr. Eliot, self-styled Tory, scorns the audience bred to this pulpit source-book, and asks for no readers but those who have time to study the Golden Bough and parse their Greek. His poetry is rigged with an automatic leisure-class device that eliminates the mere tyros who derive their information from Gayley's Classic Myths.

Poets in America, however, are chiefly Whigs. They feel entitled only to such of the Greek myths as are as well known as Mutt and Jeff; they draw freely from anything in the world of fairy tale or nursery rhyme. Miss Millay, for example, uses indiscriminately Bluebeard, Helen of Troy, and Jack and the Beanstalk. But the holiday Greeks in their gleaming blue and white world cannot supply the human and humble symbols that lie on every page of the Old Testament. The coat of many colors, the pillar of salt, and the mess of pottage have a homely reality and a romance that suits the concrete American temperament, and in the hands of its poets can become a literature at once universal and unique.

Esau, unshaved and dusty—dumb with thirst,
And sullen with a hunter's graven moods, for example, in Robert Wolf's recent book, might easily be a young New Englander who had quarreled with his brother, and knew very well the value of what he had lost: "the cows—the barns—the new-mown hay. . . ." How easily and naturally the symbolism of this old sheep-herding nation fits into the life of our stern and bitter-soiled Puritan land. Here is a vividness both ancient and modern, and although Mr. Wolf, I daresay, has not been conscious of what he is doing, he treats these simple stories with a strange blend of realistic and mystic temperament that may take us far beyond Mr. Frost's journalism or Mr. Eliot's persistently avowed disillusion.

And Mr. Wolf is only one, though, in my somewhat prejudiced opinion, the most provocative, of many. King David sang to his hook-nosed harp in last year's Nation prize award, and Jezebel carried off the honors in this one. As long ago as 1916 that innocuous comic journal the Masses was suppressed for printing a free rendition of the Virgin Birth. The best poem in D. H. Lawrence's "Look! We Have Come Through!" is his Biblical Ballad of a Wilful Woman; one of the best in Elinor Wylie's "Black Armour" is her twentieth-century Nebuchadnezzar, with his "body weary to death of his mischievous brain," to whom

. . . the dandelion is gall in a thin green pipe,
But the clover is honey and sun and the smell of sleep.

Even Robinson deserts King Arthur for Paul and Lazarus.

The fundamentalists, with their sudden chorus of wailing, have broken in on us to announce the completion of that course begun eighty short years ago under Lamarck and Lyell—the final demise of the Christian mythology as a body of fact, and its translation to gracious immortality in the world of fiction. When the Greeks no longer believed in their own gods, when they were able to deal with them with the freedom necessary for artistic composition, the Periclean age began. Like a thawing in spring, the ice is withdrawn from these fertile fields of tradition—the old earth turns south, and the soil is ready for plowing and an abundant harvest.

Books

The Way of an Eagle

Reflections on the Napoleonic Legend. By A. L. Guérard. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

A RUEFUL philosopher once remarked that it is always more entertaining to detect an untruth than to ascertain a truth. That, perhaps, is why the number of our folklorists exceeds that of our theologians. Any graduate who is pardonably deterred by the task of finding the one true way may derive a little harmless amusement from resolving a religion into two mud-sprites and a spring-god. But one could sometimes wish that a few of the active little intelligences which have been turned in these pleasing directions by Sir James Frazer and Miss Jane Harrison would devote themselves for a few years to the study of history. The folk-lore of history is a study which might well repay investigation. It would probably result in the demolition of a good many acres of apparently solid historical constructions. We could spare them. After all, most nations have more history than they really require. This proposal possesses the additional advantage that it would secure for religion a much-needed respite; and perhaps most nations have not (to judge from their public proceedings) quite as much religion as they could do with.

A lively beginning has recently been made upon the promising saga of Napoleon. There, when you come to examine it, is a magnificent congeries of historical myths. The invincible warrior, the infallible legislator, the tragic exile—each of these figures has, in turn, dominated the public imagination of Europe, until at length and together they have exasperated a charming professor in America. His reaction, if one may employ the detestable contemporary jargon, does not result in a complete demonstration of Napoleon's non-existence (such as was once achieved by Archbishop Whateley) or even in one of those tittering little biographies in which our own generation delights to denigrate its ampler predecessors. But it has moved him to a lively analysis of the Napoleonic myth and an acid comparison of its glowing outlines with the humbler features of the historical facts. Sometimes, perhaps, in his passion of disillusionment, he goes a little beyond the facts; his estimate of the Emperor's military achievements is a manifest underestimate, and there is no adequate treatment of Napoleon's astounding record as a civilian administrator, which is to be found in his interminable minutes printed in the "Correspondance." But, in the main, Professor Guérard is a fair-minded critic, whose estimate of the Emperor, midway between the blood-and-thunder of orthodox history and the milk-and-water of Professor Arthur Lévy, comes tolerably near to the truth.

The most valuable part of his book is to be found in the sections devoted to the myth itself. The slow growth of that astonishing tree, which finally overshadowed the whole imagination of the Old World, is possibly the most wonderful achievement of conscious (and of unconscious) propaganda that we have yet seen. Its development was hardly begun under the Empire itself. St. Helena was really the first movement; and one is inclined to think that Professor Guérard hardly gives sufficient credit to M. Gonnard for his patient examination of this phase. Then the growth began; and by 1840 the myth was almost complete. Here again Professor Guérard travels a shade too quickly. The subject is one which has been oddly neglected by historians. But in Mr. Fisher's lectures on Bonapartism, as well as in the opening chapters of a book on the Second Empire (from which Professor Guérard appears to have derived guilty enjoyment rather than instruction), there is a certain amount of material to show the snowball growth of the saga. The plays, the bric-a-brac, the epic poems steadily multiplied; acres of canvas were covered with battle pictures for Versailles, and mountains of stone swung slowly into place on the Arc de Triomphe, until the legend stepped on the stage full-grown. From that moment (we may place it round about the year of the Emperor's second funeral, which has made the Invalides rather than Longwood the favorite pilgrimage of all imperious little men) one may study the remarkable effects which it has produced in art and politics. "L'Aiglon," Sedan, "Les Châtiments," Meissonnier, Lord Rosebery—these are a few of the queer by-products of the Napoleonic myth. Perhaps Professor Guérard is happiest when he is examining the literary consequences of the legend: his reading is wide, his quotations are abundant, and his translation is less than usually stiff. But he is throughout a vivacious and reliable guide. Perhaps his vivacity reveals that he is a better lecturer than writer. At any rate, in one of his authorities he has found a charmed reader.

PHILIP GUEDALLA

Shelley

Shelley and the Unromantics. By Olwen Ward Campbell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

Ariel. The Life of Shelley. By André Maurois. Translated by Ella D'Arcy. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

THERE is no good life of Shelley; there is likely to be none. Dowden was kind, Mr. Campbell is superior, M. Maurois is elegant and French and worldly, and his agreeable narrative, which is largely fictitious, never deviates into an imaginative sympathy with Shelley. The works of both Mr. Campbell and M. Maurois have met with unqualified praise from the reviewers; nothing more is needed to show that a good life of Shelley is not wanted, that it would be pooh-poohed were it to appear.

Mr. Campbell has great learning and some wit. He has had access to material that was unpublished in Dowden's time; he has had the interesting notion of drawing rather keen portraits of the intimates of Shelley's circle. Hence, on the side of information, his book is a useful addition to Shelley literature. As an interpretation of Shelley as a thinker, a man, a poet it continues the old confusions and darkens counsel.

Mr. Campbell has all the symptoms of one who should never have undertaken to write about Shelley. He is capable of blandly remarking: "True patriotism is an artistic asset that few poets can dispense with." No wonder that he proposes to tell the story of an "erring" life, that he thinks Shelley should have taken the advice of Scott to get knowledge, to get understanding, that he considers Shelley to have been "wildly uncritical," that he cannot close his volume without speculating on how thoroughly Shelley, he hopes, would have shared his distaste for Zola and Ibsen and the wicked, realistic moderns. Mr. Campbell thinks that it is pleasant to be liberal, but not too liberal, to think, but not to think too hard, to deprecate convention, but to obey it. In this attitude there is a worldliness that is, substituting English for French ways, like the worldliness of M. Maurois. But no one who has even a tinge of worldliness, no one who has any sneaking fondness for prudence or profit or playing safe, should approach Shelley.

From the crucial sentence in Mr. Campbell's volume there may be derived an approach to a just view of Shelley. "His eyes discerned no light but from the moribund political philosophy of the French Revolution—Godwin, Paine, Condorcet, Voltaire, Rousseau." This is precisely true, and this is precisely Shelley's chief glory as a thinker and a character. He alone of the strictly romantic poets of Europe did not yield to the reaction toward royalism, mysticism, intolerance that marked the post-revolutionary period. The "Lyrical Ballads" were, as Mr. Campbell justly says, "heralds of dawn." But that dawn was one of poetry only. For when the "Lyrical Ballads" were published both Wordsworth and Coleridge, as men, citizens, thinkers, were already on that downward course that ended in Wordsworth's passionate opposition to the Reform Bills and in Coleridge's becoming a pillar of Anglican theology. From temptations of this sort, as from Novalis's flirting with Catholicism, Shelley was exempt. Like Hazlitt, like Heine, he protested against the reaction that followed the exhaustion of the revolutionary impulse. He kept and defended the ideas from which that impulse sprang, and the plain truth is that Mr. Campbell, hardly less than the late Professor Dowden, writes out of the tradition and the legend that was built up from the laureate odes of Wordsworth, the saintliness of Southey who urged the deportation of all liberals, the tepid meliorism in theory and laissez-faire in practice that characterized the milder types of Victorian liberalism. But the note of Shelley's mind, as of Voltaire's, as of Godwin's, sponge and rogue as the latter was, was that it was incorruptible, that it clung without variableness to certain fundamental ideas which the rationalists of the eighteenth century had discovered and which history, with iron march and unanswerable grandeur, has confirmed.

Conventional criticism has attributed to the boy and the man Shelley fantastic and extravagant ideas. The truth of the matter is that the ideas of Southey, let us say were the extravagant and fantastic ones, not the ideas of Shelley. Southey believed that war was glorious, that the church of England was the sole unspotted vessel of divine truth, that one should deport such men as Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt to penal settlements. Could ideas be more fantastic or extravagant or more at variance with right reason or the experience of mankind? What, on the other hand, did Shelley believe, what were these wild notions for which several generations have now given him their official compassion? Shelley believed that all force was wrong and futile, and that social intolerance and war were the most wicked forms of force. "Man has no right to kill his brother," he wrote. "It is no excuse that he does so in uniform: he only adds the infamy of servitude to the crime of murder." He believed—and in this he was far in advance of his age—that intolerance and war are largely caused by the nationalistic state. Hence he dreamed of a time when mankind would be not only "kingless" but "tribeless." He believed that kings and priests, the official holders of power and promulgators of myth, were the staunchest props of the tyrannical and warlike state. If these ideas are absurd, Shelley was and is absurd in good company. To regret, as Mr. Campbell does, that a man who held these views did not take the advice of Sir Walter Scott could only be matched by telling Anatole France to take the advice of Léon Daudet or to invite Mr. Bertrand Russell to submit to the instruction of the Episcopal Bishop of New York. You may agree with Shelley or not, even as you may agree with Anatole France and Bertrand Russell or not. But the boundless absurdity of the patronizing or exculpating attitude toward the ideas of Shelley should at last be clear.

But did he not—here is the stumbling-block of critics and biographers, here the source of commiseration, excuse, defense—did he not believe in "free love"? He was far too scrupulous a thinker to use a phrase so drained of any meaning. None knew better than he that of all things love is the least free.

Love, as Shelley knew it, as his biographers and critics seem never to have known it, builds up duties, responsibilities, a spirit of selflessness, service, adoration, out of its own natural splendor, out of the glow of its central and consuming fire. What Shelley believed was that men would be infinitely healthier and happier if they did not pretend to the spirit of love when it had fled or had actually never been present, that in the relations of men and women there should be honor, sincerity, cleanness, not outer pretense and furtive cruelty and hate. He believed, in brief, that love sanctifies union and that a loveless union between a man and a woman is unclean and sinful. Could any sentiments be, in the literal meaning of that much-defiled word, more respectable? In this matter, too, Shelley is quite in harmony with practically all sane modern ideas. The misinterpretation of Shelley's notions about the state, about war, about religion, and love may have had some excuse in 1870; there is none for it in 1924. And Mr. Campbell's mind is, obviously, of the older vintage.

There remains the question of Shelley's conduct, which has been a matter for so much dispute. That conduct, at its apparently wildest, needs neither defense nor excuse. "Shelley loved everything better than himself," declared the swash-buckler Trelawny; Byron admitted him to have been "the least selfish of men." In brief, Shelley was a "pure fool" in the Wagnerian sense. He acted according to the dictates of reason and of love and he could not realize, he could not, in the strong common phrase, get it through his head that people do not want reason and love nor recognize these as the proper motive powers of life; that they want convention and furtiveness, and cruelty and force. And thus he misunderstood others and these others misunderstood him. But this inability to understand the coarseness of the ordinary spiritual fabric, this belief in the reasonableness and the goodness of men despite all evidence and experience, is precisely the quality of the moral hero who, in this matter as in others, "hopes till hope creates from its own self the thing it contemplates." To the eye of the prudent, the safe, the sane such notions and such conduct as Shelley's will always have something in them of the grotesque, the pitifully young, the amusing. It is Shelley's misfortune that he cannot escape biographers who have snug academic jobs and tidy bank accounts and a position in society. But such people can never write sensibly about Shelley because they are never in his world, the world within which alone he can be understood, the world in which he refused to entail the great fortune of the Shelleys on his son because concerning that son, still in his babyhood, he could not say whether "he would become a benefactor of mankind or its bane." The ability to understand that action without surprise, to find it natural, proper, inevitable—such should be the test of the biographer of Shelley. It is clear that the shade of the poet is not likely soon to be propitiated.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

A Business Man's Utopia

The People's Corporation. By King C. Gillette. Boni and Liveright. $2.

UTOPIAS have been written by philosophers, scientists, novelists, priests. This is the first I have encountered by a business man. Though the author expressly states that his forty years in the counting-room have taken him out of the visionary class, the fact remains that what he has given us is a working drawing for a new heaven and a new earth, even to the vision of apartment houses fifty stories high, central kitchens feeding a million, and fenceless harvest fields as big as the State of Texas.

Mr. Gillette sees the tragedy of waste and confusion in the industrial system today, as many another engineer has seen it. From the standpoint of the neat efficiency of his razor factory, the world is a deplorable spectacle. How should it be run? Obviously on an engineering basis, with unit costs at a minimum. He makes an organization chart in pyramid form, with departments, promotion grades, the planning-room above, all complete. How shall it be brought about, this world factory where waste and duplication are unknown? Obviously by due corporate methods. Let the proponents of the pyramid incorporate, invest their savings in shares, and gradually buy out all the other corporations extant. This great holding company will proceed to operate an industry in the public interest so soon as it controls its common stock, and ultimately will abolish rent, interest, and profit; labor credits will become the medium of exchange, only sound necessities and comforts will be produced, the engineers will be lodged in the apex, and Utopia will be won.

Mr. Gillette's summary of waste is impressive. He grasps clearly the primary deduction between welfare as a matter of physical goods and welfare as a matter of money symbols. He is engineer rather than metaphysician. He sees that the great channels of waste are idleness, the production of non-essentials, and the failure to use accredited technical methods in production and distribution—the breadline, the battleship, the beehive coke oven. The ratio of waste he places at from 85 to 90 per cent. While this estimate can be little more than a wild guess, and while certain of his supporting figures are of a highly dubious character, his qualitative analysis at least seems to be soundly based and uniquely stated.

The industrial system is drunk and disorderly. The great world factory is full of torn belts, scaly boilers, broken gears, and unwashed windows. As a visiting stockholder, Mr. Gillette makes the round of the plant, and his indignation knows no bounds. He pounds on the table and calls for the manager. There is no manager. What! No manager? Who runs this monstrosity? Nobody runs it; it runs itself. Good God, no wonder its inefficiency cries to heaven! And the man who has sold safety razors to hairy Ainos and Russian mujiks takes off his coat, clears the desk, opens the window, gets in a stenographer, and prepares to organize the business of feeding, clothing, sheltering, educating, and amusing the people of this planet. The pyramid begins to rise.

But, despite my seeing eye to eye with the author in much of his analysis of waste, despite the sympathy I hold for an engineering approach to the job of provisioning the world, the higher this pyramid grows the fainter its outlines become, until I lose them altogether in a mist of incredulity.

As an operating technique his world corporation transcends all feats of organization of which the human mind has hitherto shown itself capable. The Supreme Economic Council of the Allied Nations is child's play compared to it, and the council had the immeasurable assistance of war psychology. What psychological drives will hold this colossus together the author does not specify. In fact, he never grapples with the psychological problem of social control at all. The behavior of the human animal is not to be tamed by charts in the shapes of pyramids. It is to be tamed, if at all, by the stubbornest kind of research into the reactions of the individual and the herd in given situations. We are yet only on the foothills of such research, and pending more data, Mr. Gillette's World Corporation can only be a leap into the dark. For all we now know, a loose federation of local economic units, each with pride in its craftsmanship, each with a strong community sense, may be far nearer the potentiality of human nature than all the world corporations—controlling every safety pin, every bun, and every biscuit—ever dreamed of.

And unexplored as is his case for an operating technique, his case for transition to the new order is even more dubious. Upon the stock exchanges of the world descends this little group of forward thinkers, announcing their intention of securing 51 per cent of oil common, steel common, rail-ways common—and with the further intention of abolishing rent, interest, and profit when the time is ripe. Need one say more? It is to be feared that in due and proper time the statistics of petitions in bankruptcy would be augmented by one. I do not think Mr. Gillette and his followers can beat the vested interests at their own game. If it be objected that not a little group, but a vast population of indignant citizens will buy into World Corporation and secure—presumably by indignation—fair market quotations from the sellers, one may legitimately ask why World Corporation at all? Why not, with the indignant majority behind one, take the physical assets by eminent domain at cost less depreciation, and thus save some tens of billions of inflated values? Steel common stands at 95 and behind it lies not one dollar of tangible investment.

No. I cannot give my vote to Mr. Gillette as general manager of World Services Incorporated. His sincerity is compelling and deep; his analysis of the industrial jungle is shrewd and imaginative, but his solution is quite untouched by the realities which guard the road to Utopia.

STUART CHASE

Much Ado About Nothing

Vogue's Book of Etiquette. By The Editors of Vogue. Condé Nast Publications. $4.

AT last, all the difficulties of civilized life have been reduced to an absurdity and the shadow of Utopia is cast before our patient and long-suffering populace: The editors of Vogue have published a book of etiquette based on common sense!

"Take it easy," is their comfortable admonition. "What is there to get so upset about? Far better is it to step right in the middle of a faux pas gracefully than to stumble clear of it with much ungracious fuss and fretful palpitation." Or words to that effect.

Who knows?—If the Condé Nast Publications keep up their good work they may yet bring the grateful calm of real repose to the American aborigines!

There is the same difference between this work and others on the subject that there is between the pleasantly self-assured Vogue itself and the pompously querulous home-town periodical. Actually, I have never read any other book on etiquette, in spite of the incredulity of those pugnaciously honest souls who democratically insist that each and every citizen of these United States has at least one guide to perfection secreted in some handy vault in case of breathless necessity. But, be that as it may, it is unquestionably true that there are few individuals in this much-harassed republic who have been allowed to remain in happy ignorance of ubiquitous and ill-drawn advertisements. And I am not one of the fortunate few. "What is wrong with this picture?" has pointed an insulting, blunt forefinger at me many a time and oft—and it does not please me. That quite unimportant question has become the all-too-sensitive nervous system in the backbone of this overgrown young nation, and it is high time something was done about it. With soothing sympathy, the editors of Vogue diagnose our neurotic case and spread a balm on our self-conscious, eager adolescence. Truly, their cheerful philosophy of "We should worry!" is welcome ointment to our growing-pains.

But this reassuring outlook does not mean that they omit the "What to do and when to do it" part of their undertaking. On the contrary. They leave nothing to the imagination at all—politely taking into consideration the fact that some of their neighbors have no such thing. If you should happen to want to dress like Queen Mary, or milk a cow like a United States Senator, or make love like Rudolph Valentino—the Editors explain in words of one syllable exactly how to go about it. Even a child could understand them. And, by the way, it is comforting to realize that no less a personage than Prince Edward Albert Christian Andrew Patrick David—who was certainly to the manor born if anybody ever was!—has, in his off moments, posed quite unintentionally for such "horrible example" photographs that even our most uncouth bronco-buster could tell at a glance what was wrong with the picture. There is no doubt that royalty themselves, poor dears, together with the rest of humanity, have their unsettled moments. It does rather put one at one's ease to remember such things, doesn't it?

Perfect poise is now within the reach of every individual. You have but to read the "Vogue's Book of Etiquette" to be as sure of maintaining your position as is the Attorney General, or the King of Greece, or the Prince of Wales, himself. But, pardon me, these illustrations may appear to some to be a bit unfortunate—though they shouldn't be, should they? Shall I say, rather, that you have but to read the "Vogue's Book of Etiquette" to wear your bathing suit at Palm Beach with as nonchalant a grace as does our own Mayor Hylan?

Instead of the time-worn notion that a knowledge of how many calling cards to leave was an Open Sesame to the Land of Heart's Desire which placed one high above the humble activities of one's fellow-men, the editors of Vogue have launched the cataclysmic statement that consideration for others mixed with a little well-placed common sense is the real basis of good breeding.

If I were asked to advise the fretful, fond American mamma in the way in which her difficult daughter should be led I should unhesitatingly say: "Take her out of that finishing school at once, madam, and give her the 'Vogue's Book of Etiquette' to read. It will probably take less time; it will be much better for her disposition, to say nothing of her digestion—shades of the tremulous silence that hung about my boarding school's unfestive board!—and, incidentally, it is much, much cheaper."

KATHLEEN MILLAY

Ignatius Loyola

Ignatius Loyola. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE writer of the article on Ignatius Loyola in the Catholic Encyclopedia expresses regret that there is no "commendable" life of the saint by a Protestant, a regret for which, we should think, there is no longer any occasion. Mr. Sedgwick has written an interesting and apparently well-documented book and has written it in a spirit of fairness and comprehension that can hardly be overpraised. Not that it is especially complimentary to say of a biographer that he has approached his subject without prejudice or antipathy, but the truth is that a good deal of non-Catholic writing on Catholic themes has taught us to be thankful for very small favors. And obviously it is not an easy task for a twentieth-century Protestant to write of the founder of the Jesuit Order with understanding and sympathy. Anyone can write of Francis of Assisi, and far too many have done so. Benedict and Bernard and Theresa are splendid figures even to the myopic vision of anti-Catholic prejudices; but Ignatius Loyola makes himself difficult. He lacks the poetry and sweetness of Francis, the pure elevation of Theresa, the range and sweep of Benedict and Bernard. But he was a great man, for all that, and Mr. Sedgwick almost persuades us that he was an amiable one. Amiable or not, he was the founder of an organization that has exerted an enormous influence not only upon the whole of Western Europe, but upon the Orient and the American continent as well. If the methods of the Lutheran reformers had been less violent and their aims less radical, if the Reformation had followed the lines marked out for it by Erasmus and Budé and Lefèvre d'Étaples, it is not impossible, as Mr. Sedgwick suggests, that Loyola's attitude toward it would have been quite different, and quite different, in consequence, the later history of the church. For, after all, what Loyola and his friends desired was not so unlike the hopes of the humanists—to reform the church from within by means of education and devotion, by simplicity of life and doctrine, by missionary zeal and becoming "all things to all men." The main difference was that Erasmus began at the top, with scholars and prelates, while Loyola began at the bottom, with peasants and schoolboys. But there was another difference that probably renders all such speculations fantastic. Loyola records that while he was still educating himself for his mission, he began to read Erasmus's "Enchiridion Militis Christiani," or "Handbook of a Christian Soldier," and that as he read he felt a spiritual "numbness" creeping upon him which told him that the book was dangerous. He recognized, in other words, the Erasmian note of reason and moderation, the genuine note of humanism, which was as foreign to his temper as to Luther's own.

Mr. Sedgwick has taken especial pains to face the objections that are most often urged against the spirit of Loyola's institute, by Catholics no less than Protestants. He meets the charge of duplicity by citing the worst examples that he can find, and they are certainly not imposing. That, as General of the Order, Loyola assigned unpleasant tasks through subordinates, rather than in person, so as not to forfeit the affection of his subjects, and that he carefully refrained from showing either pleasure or displeasure except with a view to discipline, are practices, we may agree, which are not too heinous. No more is his habit of seeking the favor of kings and nobles and prelates for the Society. Of any suggestion that "the end justifies the means," Mr. Sedgwick finds no trace in the writings or the conduct of Loyola or his companions, and this is more than can be said of a good many modern organizations, both religious and political, that would indignantly repudiate the charge of "Jesuitry." Loyola's emphasis upon discipline and obedience is no doubt excessive, but, as Mr. Sedgwick remarks, "there is no more room for patriotic agnosticism in West Point than for religious agnosticism in a Jesuit college." The founder of the Company of Jesus is not an attaching figure; few military commanders are. But Mr. Sedgwick makes it plain that his companions loved him, even though his virtues are too severe to win the affection of so relaxed and undisciplined a generation as ours.

CHARLES H. A. WAGER

Economics of the Madhouse

Absentee Ownership. By Thorstein Veblen. B. W. Huebsch. $3.

TWENTY years ago Thorstein Veblen published a notable essay contrasting the pecuniary and the industrial functions of the entrepreneur. This distinction he now develops in the light of twentieth-century conditions. Absentee owners control production, and their business interests no longer coincide in any passable degree with the material interests of the underlying population, who need maximum output at low cost, while the owners may gain most through moderate output at enhanced price. Hence the essential technique of present-day business consists in a discreet sabotage by the "massive interests" which control production through their grip on credit and the basic industries. These interests keep prices at a profitable level by a proper restriction of output and due unemployment, thus throttling down the inordinate productiveness occasioned by the inventor and the engineer. Under thin disguise of approval, Mr. Veblen thus draws a terrific indictment of our current industrial scheme, elaborating it through four hundred pages of caustic wit—albeit at cost of much wearisome repetition.

Absentee ownership—that is, ownership in excess of what a man can use personally—is embedded in morals and law, and is upheld by the nation, "a politically self-determining body of people, legally and morally competent to make war." The authorities of the democratic state are concerned chiefly about the business of the nation's substantial citizens, who in return furnish the model that all good people copy. It is a wonderful picture that Mr. Veblen draws of the man of affairs who has made good according to our dominant country-town standards. "The country town of the great American farming region is the perfect flower of self-help and cupidity standardized on the American plan." An enterprise in real-estate promotion and retail selling, its ambition is to get something for nothing, and its dominant note is circumspection—"salesmanlike pusillanimity"! Incidentally, its stocks, equipment, and personnel are from three to eleven times as large as are really needed to do its work.

Historically, the great American adventure has been the conversion of our rich natural resources to private gain. In coal, iron, and transportation the process is about complete, and it is proceeding rapidly in water-power. After such conversion, the use of these resources is regulated on the principle of "rendering no greater service than that minimum which will yield a satisfactory net gain to their absentee owners." The routine of waste and inefficiency involved in converting these public resources to private gain is a matter of course, and indeed is commonly regarded as a meritorious work, "developing the country."

With the coming of the trusts, big business is coming to supplant the small town as the arbiter of our destinies, but it takes over the country-town standards, naturally with the approval of the community. A new order in industry, brought about by the growth of the industrial arts and of man power, has arisen, but the new order, like the old one, is controlled by business enterprise, whose whole duty is to make money and insure a satisfactory return on a multiplying volume of securities. With the key industries brought fairly well under collusive control, big business finds a maximum profit in a varying degree of sabotage, or "conscientious withdrawal of efficiency." The whole argument thus rests on the assumption of a quasi-monopolistic control of business, an assumption that will be vigorously denied by business critics and orthodox economists alike.

It is perhaps unnecessary to follow the argument through all its ramifications and reiterations. With industry now taken over and run by the technicians, but kept vastly below its normal technical productiveness for the good and sufficient business reason of more profits at higher prices, with the constant creation of new securities bringing in their train added fixed charges and the consequent necessity for high prices, with the machinery of credit, now effectively controlled by the dominant business interests, more and more systematically used to keep up prices, and with salesmanship increasingly taking the place of workmanship as the means to business success, profits cease almost wholly to be correlated with service, success comes to be attained at the cost of the livelihood of the underlying population, and that livelihood becomes more and more precarious as business necessities require a larger and larger margin of business sabotage and consequent unemployment.

We are thus led, by a new route, to something much like the old Marxian division of society, with "the Interests" on one side and "the underlying population" on the other. The Interests and their general staff, the investment bankers, along with their lesser allies, "are engaged in a loosely collusive plan for bringing the industrial man-power to reasonable—that is to say, profitable—terms by the punitive use of unemployment," at the same time increasing outstanding securities and providing more working capital to be applied toward increased sales costs.

This dismal picture, with all its exaggeration, represents truly enough one important tendency strongly at work in current business life. Whether, as Mr. Veblen maintains, it represents the main drift, is more open to question. The trouble with all theories of increasing misery is that the wretched victims stubbornly refuse to become increasingly miserable. Our author would scarcely maintain, for example, that the unemployment of 1921 was, relatively speaking, more disastrous than that of 1894. But with a skilful use of invidious words and clever phrases, such troublesome problems may be avoided rather than faced. The intelligent reader, then, will not swallow Mr. Veblen's book whole, but instead will read it gladly for its endless suggestiveness, for its unsparing criticism of current conventions that are generally accepted in discreet silence, for its pitiless dissection of popular beliefs that rest on nothing better than tradition, for its keen discernment of underlying tendencies, for its sheer fun. It is a book for readers who are not afraid to think and laugh.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Olive Schreiner

The Life of Olive Schreiner. By S. C. Cronwright-Schreiner. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

MR. CRONWRIGHT-SCHREINER'S biography of his wife, Olive Schreiner, whose name he took at her request when they were married, has been awaited with mixed emotions by all those who knew her. They realized that Olive's husband, whom she had loved most tenderly up to the last moment of her life, and who held possession of all her papers, journals, etc., should in the nature of things possess, as no one else could, the material and the knowledge necessary to create the illusion of her presence. Yet the volume, "Stories, Dreams, and Allegories," published two years after her death, did not inspire confidence in him as her biographer. Within a few weeks of her death the London Nation and Athenaeum had published an article of hers, entitled The Dawn of Civilization, a superb thing, which she herself had handed to her husband just before their last parting, saying that this stood ready for printing, and that if she died he might publish it. In the posthumous volume, however, one found a curiously heterogeneous assortment of pieces, the latest dating from three years before her death, the earliest from her girlhood. None of them approached the standard of The Dawn of Civilization; none of them added to her reputation as a writer; some of them, on her husband's own admission, she did not wish to have published. One decided then that the affectionate zeal of Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner and Mr. Havelock Ellis had outrun their artistic discretion.

One's misgivings about the Life, however, were not groundless. From the first page of the preface it is impossible not to feel that this large, handsome, careful volume of over four hundred pages, considered as the biography of a great woman written by her husband, is an equally amazing and dismaying performance. He begins by telling us that he thinks if Olive Schreiner could have chosen, she would have preferred that no biography of herself should be written. [But] Feeling quite sure that, if I did not write the biography, some unauthorized life would appear, necessarily incomplete and almost certainly incorrect, I felt myself compelled to take up the work.

He adds:

In so far as so complex and baffling a human being can be known, I repeat that I am the only person who can be said to have known her, the only person who ever had adequate opportunity of knowing her fully (not excluding even her own family).

There is something almost childish, almost pathological, in the vehemence of this prefatory statement which will arrest half-way the instant protest it must cause in the hearts of a score of men and women who knew both him and her.

When Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner, "inspired throughout," as he says, "by my heart's love, by profound admiration and deep reverence," proceeds to the biography proper, the unease and distaste which that extraordinary prefatory remark leaves with us do not disappear. One admits that geniuses, as a rule, are hard to live with, eccentric, undependable; one admits that her husband may have found Olive Schreiner no exception to the rule. But page after page of the book is taken up with details so selected that it is impossible to remain unaware of Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner's naive dramatization of himself as the noble and willing victim.

Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner would contend, one presumes, that truth must be served. But a caricature is, however brilliant, only a half-truth. That he did not intend this portrait of his wife to be a caricature one may be certain; yet his own humorlessness, with its attendant lack of proportion, achieves just that effect. We are told, repeatedly, that her eccentric habits made her impossible in boarding-houses; we are nowhere told how, in great houses and small, she was a loved and honored and a frequent guest. We are told that she banged the doors at night, walking up and down in their house at De Aar, so that he had frequently to remonstrate with her; we are not told of the innumerable exquisite acts of delicate kindness and forethought which made of her friendship a thing different in kind as well as in degree from that of more ordinary folk. We are told that she did not mingle in "the social life of De Aar," a phrase which will bring a wry smile to the lips of anyone acquainted with that fascinating township; we are told nowhere of her limpid, saint-like simplicity, which drew to her without shyness the most ignorant and unlettered of men and women, who took on new beauty and dignity while they talked with her. We are told that in 1910, the year of the Union of South Africa, she "wrote some wild letters and then resigned" from the Women's Enfranchisement League of the Cape Province, on the question of its amalgamation with other South African societies; we are not told that her resignation and her anger were alike inevitable to a person who fought always against injustice, and that they have been more than justified by subsequent events. The suffrage qualifications of the Cape Province League, unlike those of the other three leagues of South Africa, contain no color bar. An amalgamation would have meant adding this clause, as Olive Schreiner foresaw; and she and some few others of us were not prepared to buy our enfranchisement at the price of further humiliation for our colored sisters.

There is one statement, lengthy and precise, in Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner's book so painful to read that one cannot linger upon it. In 1911 Olive Schreiner published her "Woman and Labour." Her introduction explains that this is a fragmentary recollection of the large book on Woman which she had been working on more or less all her life, and which in 1899, when the Boer War broke out, was completed except for the revision and the preface. She then describes in detail how, under martial law, she was forbidden to return to her home in Johannesburg; how in her absence it was looted, her desk forced, and her papers, including the book, burned in the room; and how a friend, eight months later, visited for her the looted house, and gathered up and stored the useless fragments of charred paper. "I then knew my book had been destroyed." The whole of this statement her husband categorically denies. He has no real evidence for this; across "the eternal silence" it is incredibly, most mournfully, her word against his. Asked to believe that the most mercilessly honest, the most fearless, the most radiantly truthful mind I have ever known has, at the best, lived under so strange an hallucination for half a lifetime, I speak not for myself alone when I protest against this unproved statement and take my stand on her word rather than on his.

With all its lacunae, intentional or unintentional, the book yet gives us, on page after page, glimpses of the Olive Schreiner we loved and marveled at. Mr. Cronwright-Schreiner has done well to include Arthur Symonds's beautiful and vivid account of his afternoon with her in 1889. "The day of days," it begins, "... I can now realize all that can be told of woman, of the great woman, and I feel that Olive Schreiner is the greatest of them all." The description of her life as a governess in her teens helps one to understand her later ill-health and to admire afresh her unembittered and unwarped outlook, which until the very end, despite physical torture and spiritual isolation, loved and forgave us all, without illusions and with an utter selflessness. In one of the few letters to her husband which one may read without an oppressive sense of sanctities violated by its printing, she sums up this matter of loving, so gloriously clear to her: "Perfect sincerity, perfect freedom; without it no perfect love. The love which seeks the highest development of the loved along the lines most natural to them is the only great and perfect love."

RUTH S. ALEXANDER

Samuel Pepys

The Diary of Samuel Pepys. Transcribed by the Late Rev. Mynors Bright. Edited with Additions by Henry B. Wheatley. Three volumes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $15.

The Soul of Samuel Pepys. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

ALMOST exactly a hundred years after Lord Braybrooke gave half of Pepys's diary to the world the whole of it becomes available at a more or less popular price. Not quite the whole of it, either, for Mr. Wheatley, setting out in 1893 to publish ten volumes which should be complete, found "a few passages which cannot possibly be printed." His plea for pardon on this score was impressive then and it is impressive now, when the ten volumes are condensed to three by the use of India-paper: "It may be thought by some that these omissions are due to an unnecessary squeamishness, but it is not really so, and readers are therefore asked to have faith in the judgment of the editor." It may seem too bad that any word of Pepys should remain dark; but the public possesses all of him which it is humanly possible in the present era of printing to expect. It is no longer excusable to be ignorant of the least thing the man did; Mr. Wheatley's asterisks will always prompt a guess, and the guess will nine times out of ten be right.

A new reading of the matchless diary will prove among other things its unkillable freshness. One may have wearied of hearing from critics that it is intimate, complete, naive, ludicrously human, and incredibly valuable to historians. But one will feel no weariness among these pages. They survive all the talk about them during the past century as they survived the obscurity in which they lay during the previous century and a half. It is as joyful as it ever was to hear Pepys saying in his inimitably private way that he lay late in bed this morning; then to the office, where he did pay four men their money and pulled the ear of a lazy boy; then to the 'Change, talking there for an hour with Mr. So-and-So; then to an ale-house for oysters and a kiss from the wench there, the lower part of whose face was as pretty as any ever seen; thence home, where I found my wife and maid a-washing. I staid up till the bell-man came by with his bell just under my window as I was writing of this very line, and cried, "Past one of the clock, and a cold, frosty, windy morning." I then went to bed, and left my wife and the maid a-washing still.

It is as tempting as it ever was to speculate upon the motives of Pepys in writing so endlessly and so shamelessly about himself; whether it was because he loved to write anyway—he is one of the finest of English prose writers—or because he felt himself most when he was alone with his pen, or because he was so insatiable a collector of life—as he was of books and plays and kisses—that he could never quite endure to let it escape into total nothing.

One aspect of Pepys remains to be studied with some care, and the materials, except here and there where Mr. Wheatley has resorted to dots of omission, are everywhere at hand. Pepys as a lover of women is at once monstrous, laughable, and pathetic. Neither the variety nor the range of his amours is commonly appreciated. Jealous as Mrs. Pepys was, she could not have dreamed of the hundreds of occasions on which her husband, to put it mildly, forgot her. On street corners, at apple stands, in ale-houses, in parks, at the houses of friends, in coaches, by his own fireside, and in his own kitchen he seems constantly to have tingled from the arrows of love. There are Mrs. Turner, Mrs. Bagwell, Mrs. Martin, Mrs. Ashwell; there is Jane Wayneman; there is Deb Willet, whose loss from the household caused the poor man to suffer acutely; and there are dozens without name. The pathos of the case lies in the failure of Pepys to understand or accept himself as he was. His conscience gave him more trouble than his heart.

So to my office a little and to Jervas's again, thinking avoir recontrais Jane, mais elle n'était pas dedans. So I back again and to my office, where I did with great content ferai a vow to mind my business, and laisser aller les femmes for a month, and am with all my heart glad to find myself able to come to so good a resolution, that thereby I may follow my business, which and my honour thereby lies a-bleeding. So home to supper and to bed.

Mr. Bradford might have been expected sooner or later to submit Pepys to the processes of his psychography. The result in "The Soul of Samuel Pepys" is a study which, like all of Mr. Bradford's studies, is both weak and strong. Its value lies in its separate essays on Pepys as a business man, as a spender of money, as a man of mind, as a husband and lover, and as a church-goer. The quotations grouped under these heads furnish a short-cut to Pepys for those who have no time for the voluminous diary. The generalizations, however, and the remarks of interpretation are shallow. It is by no means clear that the Restoration was "a backwater in the stream of English and human progress." And Mr. Bradford's tone of rather fatuous familiarity with Pepys and the reader grows steadily more offensive. Nothing is added to the force of a quotation by such sentences as: "I don't blame her for being troubled, do you?"; "Can you beat that?"; "Did it pay, Pepys, did it pay?"; "Good-bye, good-bye, charming Mrs. Pepys!"

MARK VAN DOREN

A Tragic Theme

The Fir and the Palm. By Elizabeth Bibesco. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

THAT Princess Bibesco's brilliant novel should be only a little marred by its brilliance will seem to those who know the author's short stories a tribute to its qualities. The stories were often too witty to be wise, but "The Fir and the Palm" reminds one merely of a sensitive, serious-eyed little girl whose mother mistakenly dresses her in sophisticated satin frocks. The essence of the novel transcends its trappings, and yet one cannot help wishing that the décor were less obtrusive—the perfumes fainter, the objets d'art fewer—and the talk less uniformly epigrammatic.

The theme itself needed no such glitter and elaboration of setting. Reduced to simple terms, it gives us Helen, a charming, unawakened woman, married to a man who loves her but refrains for certain delicate reasons of his own from expressing the full depth of his tenderness, and it gives us Toby, a philanthropist playing for friendship but using a too ingratiating personality as a lure—Toby, whom Helen comes to love with terrifying humility, only to discover how little he desires her gift. Through her pathetic passion she learns in time to understand the feeling she inspires in her husband, but the tale ends uncompromisingly. The lonely fir continues to dream unavailingly of the palm.

One can but accept Helen and Toby: they are real. The adored woman—Christopher and others as well as her husband adore her—rejected by the one man to whom she would give herself and receiving her dismissal with pitiful courage, is utterly real. And the man who wooed her in the hope of monopolizing a flattering friendship but drew back from the flaming abandon that threatened his peace of mind and body, he too is real. Unfortunately, the secondary characters, vividly sketched as some of them are, often disrupt the consistency of the story; like the hot-house background that frequently usurps the foreground and the smart conversations, jerkily swinging the tenser scenes out of their rhythm, they diminish rather than heighten the effectiveness of the central situation.

That situation was well worth presenting, however, and it has been presented with extraordinary sympathy and insight. Conventional standards of conduct must of course be forgotten in judging it. Helen, for instance, so long as she is unaware of her husband's love for her, never questions her right to love another man. She lives, therefore, not in the stifling atmosphere of an illicit infatuation but in the bright air and sea-swept spaces of a great passion. And so tenderly has she been drawn, so admirably realized, that the emotional appeal of the story arises unaided from the tragedy inherent in that passion. To have weighted her with a sense of guilt would have dislocated all the values of the situation.

GRACE FRANK

The American Revolution

Revolutionary New England, 1691-1776. By James Truslow Adams. Atlantic Monthly Press. $5.

Samuel Adams, Promoter of the American Revolution: A Study in Psychology and Politics. By Ralph Volney Harlow. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

SEVERAL studies of the problem involved in the causes of the American Revolution have recently been published and more are promised in the near future. What is the occasion of this renewed agitation about an old scandal? It may be due in part to the war which brought England and the United States into closer bonds of sympathy, and it may be ascribed also to the natural reaction in scientific quarters to the popular propaganda concerning the subject in the public press and in some of the State legislatures. The Wisconsin law, for instance, prohibiting the teaching of history textbooks which "defame" the founders of our nation, is a red rag waved in the face of the historical bulls. There is, however, a much more direct cause for the appearance of these studies by serious scholars. Before the outbreak of the World War there had developed a strong impetus toward a modern interpretation of the American past and these recent treatises are the continuance of a movement which was interrupted by the war.

The two volumes under consideration are evidently products of the evolutionary movement rather than the results of recent public agitation, although there is internal evidence that both authors have not been unmindful of the Anglophobia of Mr. Hearst's newspapers and have anticipated with some pleasure the attacks which may be expected from that quarter. Let the New York Historical Committee take note that Mr. Harlow interprets Samuel Adams as a "neurotic crank" and that Mr. Adams characterizes John Hancock as "exceedingly vain, of very mediocre talents, fond of applause, and easily influenced." Should not both volumes be barred from all public libraries?

The two volumes furnish a reliable measure of the distance traveled by recent historians away from the older and still traditional view of the American Revolution. For George Bancroft and the school of historians following him the revolution was caused by the spontaneous uprising of a free and liberty-loving people against the tyrannical acts of George III and his parliament. The naivete of this explanation, long maintained even by serious students, was bound to be discarded when more intensive and extensive studies were undertaken. In the scholarly world it has not been held for two decades at least. Mr. Harlow's interpretation is almost as simple. "Justifiable the revolutionary movement may have been," he writes, "but it was far from being the result of spontaneous public action. 'Machine-made' would describe it with considerably more fitness than 'democratical' (p. 148). Mr. Adams does not agree with this later view, however. He writes: "If there is much false history and no little absurdity in the old legend of a practically unanimous population of Americans suddenly rising in the few years from 1763 to 1776, to resist the slavery that a king and his tools were said to be consciously striving to force upon them, no less unhistorical is the view that the revolution was the work of a few scheming radicals" (p. 450).

Both historians have been trained in the imperial school represented by Osgood, Beer, and Andrews, but both reveal some weaknesses in their knowledge of English politics. Both are familiar with Turner's Western viewpoint, but both have also been affected by an even more recent school of thought, that of the psychological historians. In one of his illuminating generalizations—possibly not always consistent—Mr. Adams declares that the revolution was as much "a psychological as a political manifestation, and, indeed, the whole revolutionary period offers a fascinating field for psychological study" (p. 320). To this generalization he remains on the whole faithful, and his study of New England is directed toward the tracing of the development in the colonies of a national psychological condition which was so different from that of England that common ground for mutual understanding had become very small. The war was the consequence, then, of misunderstanding. Separation was bound to occur sooner or later. The immediate occasion was due to the changes in the imperial machinery inaugurated by ministers ignorant of American public opinion and to leaders in America who made use of the Englishmen's mistakes to work up the public to a political frenzy. The particular leader responsible for the hysteria of the people was Samuel Adams.

Few, if any, will criticize Mr. Adams for his employment of psychological methods so moderate and reasonable. But many readers will be startled by the direct and positive application of psychoanalysis to the character of Samuel Adams by Mr. Harlow. The starting-point is found in Adams's early failures in business, law, and civil office, the result of which was the development in his mind of an "inferiority complex." Herein lies the explanation of all his later activities. "Neurotics," writes Mr. Harlow, "almost invariably fix the blame for their failures upon something or someone apart from themselves. . . . Because he blamed the British Government for his failures, he had to lead a crusade against it. Hatred of that sort, unreasoning though it may be, furnishes an irresistible impetus to act, and in many cases to lead others to action. These followers, entirely ignorant of the true nature of their leader's fervor, may look upon him as a heroic patriot, when he may be only a neurotic crank" (p. 65). In order to adjust their personalities to their environment neurotics create a "mental world of their own" into which they retreat. "In this world of ideas, which he [Adams] built up, the British Government was always hopelessly at variance with the colonies, always seeking for new means to tyrannize over them, always savagely bent upon reducing them to bondage. . . . Those striking exaggerations in his correspondence . . . were descriptions, not of actual facts in the real world but of conditions which he saw in his imaginary world, the mere fabric of a dream" (p. 170).

Mr. Harlow carries this analysis of Samuel Adams consistently through the period of agitation, 1764-1776, but after the latter date he finds some difficulty and is satisfied with the statement of a general breakdown in his subject, after the object of his life was accomplished.

There can be no criticism of this attempt to explain Samuel Adams by the process of psychoanalysis. This concession doesn't mean that I am convinced by Mr. Harlow's reasoning. All politicians try to show the same intenseness of their convictions, the same hatred of the ways of their opponents. For instance, if the same method were applied to the opponents of

Mr. Wilson and the League of Nations, I fear we should discover a whole galaxy of neurotic cranks, Lodge, Borah, Hiram Johnson, George Harvey, and even the editor of The Nation. Their convictions reveal the same "religious fervor" as those of Samuel Adams. Political faith and enthusiasm for what is believed to be political truth are in general easily understood without assuming the existence of diseased minds, although man is so constituted that, like the Scotch Presbyterian, he thinks all opponents a "little odd." CLARENCE W. ALVORD

Chekhov

Anton Chekhov. By William Gerhardt. Duffield and Company. $2.

UNTIL the Moscow Art Theater came here and repaid in some measure its debt to Chekhov by featuring his plays in its repertoire, the circle of his American readers was extremely small; in fact, it was almost entirely confined to the practitioners of the short story who sought inspiration and example from the master of that art. For Americans have been extremely skittish where Russian authors were concerned ever since they plugged through the ponderous volumes and ponderous thoughts of Tolstoi and blundered among those inconsistencies of the troubled conscience that Dostoevski called his mind. Their acceptance of these two authors despite their tragic inability to appreciate them is another testimonial to the efficiency of German publicity. And there is an element of divine irony in the fact that, left to their own devices, they fought shy of the Slavic antidote for Slavic melancholia.

This antidote is to be found in the works of Gogol and Turgenyev, of Chekhov and Maxim Gorki. Chekhov understood the Russian better than either Tolstoi or Dostoevski did, and described him more skilfully and more truly. As Mr. Gerhardt points out, "It is all but useless to classify his subject matter. It encompasses all kinds of Russian life that one can think of; and it is the consummative variety of his works remembered as a whole that fills one with a mingled sense of wonder and of lost opportunities."

Above all, Chekhov differs from the others because he will not weep for the mujik, nor teach him, nor present him as a Rousseau ideal. "I have peasant blood in my veins," he once wrote—he was the son of a serf—"and you won't astonish me with peasant virtues." At a time in Russia when everyone was demonstrating his allegiance to the liberal or the conservative philosophy and choosing his side in the struggle between monarchy and revolution, Chekhov would not permit himself to desert the impartial stand of the artist.

I have no preference either for gendarmes, or for butchers, or for scientists, or for writers, or for the younger generation. I regard trade-marks and labels as a superstition. My holy of holies is the human body, health, intelligence, talent, inspiration, love, and the most absolute freedom—freedom from violence and lying, whatever forms they may take.

He held to this program. This detachment enabled him to communicate to his readers the consciousness that they were observing a work of art and, at the same time, to imbue them with the feeling that they were participating imaginatively in the experiences of his characters. And, therefore, while I cannot agree with Mr. Gerhardt that Chekhov "is the most subtle and delicately discriminating, and yet also the most level-headed and humorous of all Russian writers, as well as the most truly civilized of men," I feel that he is the most appealing and the most intelligible author for non-Russian readers. His unerring and almost intuitive appreciation of character and his direct, succinct representation of thought and emotion enable him to express more fully than can those who are his superiors both in subtlety and in humor the individual idiosyncrasies and the underlying irony of Russian life.

Chekhov has himself revealed in a passage too long for quotation his manner and difficulties of writing, his consciousness of faults and failings. He was always susceptible to editorial pressure and revision; for better or for worse, the Chekhov that appeared in print was not the Chekhov that dreamt his story. It is here that Mr. Gerhardt is inadequate. The study is too formal, too intent on J. Middleton Murry's laws of criticism to be intimate and to capture the lawlessness of the artist's aspirations. Mr. Gerhardt is sympathetic and scholarly; he has written all there is to know about his subject. But he is neither consubstantial nor close enough to write all one should feel about Chekhov.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

New Light on Ancient Egypt

The Tomb of Tut-ankh-amun. By Howard Carter and A. C. Mace. George H. Doran Company. $5.

Tutankhamen and Other Essays. By Arthur Weigall. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

ACCORDING to Napoleon Bonaparte, Egypt is the most important of all lands. Certainly its history and civilization are among the most interesting and valuable of antiquity. The glamor that for the Greeks clothed the land of the pyramids has not been lost upon us, especially since its desert sands have been forced to yield so many time-honored secrets.

From the point of view of Egyptian art and culture, no discovery ever made in the country of the Pharaohs can equal the finding of Tutankhamen's tomb. The narrative given by Messrs. Carter and Mace is a preliminary account of the work of 1923. After giving us a glimpse of Tutankhamen's place in history, and of the story of the valley of the tomb, Mr. Carter tells how he waited anxiously for a grant from the Egyptian Government to excavate there. This grant was not forthcoming until the authorities believed that there was nothing more to be found in the valley. Mr. Carter, however, felt certain that Tutankhamen's tomb must be in that vicinity and carried on his search methodically. It is a thrilling and romantic tale that he has to tell and we can experience with him the suspense and anticipation that must have been his while he awaited the arrival of Lord Carnarvon before opening the door of the tomb. But the chief value of Mr. Carter's book lies in the description of the objects found. He estimates them as probably only a quarter of the treasure contained in the tomb, for there are other chambers which cannot be reached until the more immediate are emptied. But the 89 plates which the book presents afford us an excellent exhibition of the interesting objects found so far. Unfortunately the illustrations are not so clear or so beautiful as were those which appeared in the New York Times.

Mr. Weigall's volume does not confine itself to the theme of Tutankhamen. In its wide scope and charming presentation, it is both valuable and entertaining. The discussion of the future of the excavations in Egypt reveals the seriousness of the present situation. The Egyptian nation, which has awakened to a new feeling of its dignity and destiny, is not disposed to allow its treasures to be carried off to other lands. On the other hand, the Cairo Museum is pitifully inadequate to take care of the deluge of valuable objects showered upon it by Mr. Carter's discovery. The author pleads for the Egyptian viewpoint and insists that foreign excavators must not assume an attitude of outraged dignity but rather of gratitude. In view of the recent press reports of Mr. Carter's friction with the Egyptian authorities, the wisdom of his advice is apparent. Incidentally Mr. Weigall speaks of the great mistake Lord Carnarvon made of selling all news rights of the discovery to the Times, and of the storm this aroused in Egypt. His

hb

Harcourt, Brace & Company

383 Madison Ave., New York

hb

By the author of
THE WORLD'S ILLUSION

Jacob Wassermann's

GOLD

A great Wassermann novel, an epic of the human race in which two women are the protagonists for the forces of good and evil.

"'Gold' could not come from the heart of any generation save one stricken all but to death. A novel of epic sweep and grandeur."—N. Y. Times. $2.50

T. S.
Stribling's

Red Sand

By the Author of
"Birthright"

"This gorgeous pageant."—N. Y. Times.

"Red Sand is a novel of which Conrad himself might be proud."—Brooklyn Eagle. $2.00

PORT OF NEW YORK

By Paul Rosenfeld
$3.00

Dorothy Canfield's

Waste

By the Author of
"TOGETHER"

"The most powerful indictment of the American scene that we have ever read. Beside this tremendous work the silly prattle of the minor novelists fades like the whisper of a child in the wind."—Chicago Daily News. $2.00

Wassermann's

G
O
L
D

The Home-Maker

By the author of
"The Brimming Cup"

With each new volume it has become increasingly apparent that Dorothy Canfield is one of the major novelists of America. The "Home Maker" is her most ambitious book. You will enjoy it and discuss it. $2.00

Wassermann's

G
O
L
D

J. E. Spingarn POEMS

Author of "Creative Criticism," etc.

"One of the finest collections of verse which has been published in some time."—Springfield Union. $2.00

Apples Here in My Basket

By Helen Hoyt

Lyric poems which express the moods of a woman completely in love. $1.50 chapter on the historical problems connecting the old story of Manetho, of "the expulsion of the lepers" as preserved by Josephus, with the Aton heresy at Tell-el-Amarna, is very illuminating, though we may be pardoned for refusing to credit the connection he tries to establish between Moses and Tutankhamen as Pharaoh of the Exodus. In a chapter on the "ancient ghouls of Thebes," he describes the activities of tomb-robbars in the days of the Pharaohs on the basis of literary records and the attempts of various rulers to insure the safety of their tombs. The fate of Lord Carnarvon, attributed by the superstitious to evil spirits, gives him occasion to tell rather startling incidents of his own knowledge which he regards as coincidences but which minds less balanced will seize upon as proof of superstition. Of particular interest are his chapters on the ancient stone quarries of Wady Hammamat and of Mons Claudianus, and on the imperial porphyry quarries. As few modern explorers have visited these places, his story is valuable. Very delectable is the idyl entitled "The Red Sea Highroad," with its picture of indolent, timeless desert life. The flooding of lower Nubia by the great dam on the Nile is justified at some length by the author, who had a share in this undertaking. Finally he gives us his reflections on the Egyptian Empire, on Egypt as the gateway of the East, and on the meaning of civilization. The great World War has led him to realize that civilization is not the greatest of all things. He is too intelligent to resort to the claim of the ignorant that the war was a battle of civilization against barbarism, for, he says, "the Germans are probably the most civilized people in the world." To him the war was rather for a moral ideal threatened by civilization. How he can make such an assertion at this late day in the face of the Russian archives and of the Treaty of Versailles remains a deep mystery.

E. G. H. KRAELING

Rolland and Gandhi

Mahatma Gandhi. By Romain Rolland. The Century Company. $1.50.

ROMAIN ROLLAND is historian of the inner life of our age. Three times now he has set the seal of his mind and his spirit on an era: before the war; during the war; and after the war: once for the past; once for the present; and once for the future. "Jean-Christophe" was more than a panorama of pre-war European civilization seen through the eyes of a composer of genius; it was a European book, and it may yet prove to have been the only European book since Goethe's "Faust." In "Clorambault" Romain Rolland has left us a record of the human mind in war time. It is both ghastly and beautiful. It was one of those tasks which should be done and Romain Rolland, little as he may have enjoyed it, was the man to do it. There it stands for the world to read.

But now for the future. It is Rolland's life of Gandhi. Here East meets West; Europe turns to Asia; a pacifist thinker writes the biography of a pacifist man of action. The book is a milestone at historic crossways.

Dramatic as is this juxtaposition of personalities, it would be easy to overlook the actual significance of this volume, and for more reasons than one. First, the stark austerity of the writing. In it Rolland has returned to the terse, sinewy style of his earlier biographies—particularly that of his "Michelangelo"—in which everything is stripped to the buff, "all bone and strings," as athletes say. The result is a book so easy to read that superficial readers, after once galloping through it, will be betrayed into thinking they have possessed themselves of its content. Not so fast! The method of M. Rolland in this curt brevity of fact-presentation is to set forth the life events of his figure in such a musical scoring of narrative that the spirit of the man will shine through his action. In "Jean-Christophe" this master of prose and of thought wrote narra-

TOMB OF THE PRIME MINISTER RAINIHARO

MADAGASCAR

LAND of the MAN-EATING TREE

Chase Salmon Osborn, LL.D.

EX-GOVERNOR OF MICHIGAN
AUTHOR OF "THE IRON HUNTER," "THE ANDEAN LAND,"
"THE LAW OF DIVINE CONCORD," ETC.

THIS is a traveller's book, such as Herodotus, Marco Polo or Mark Twain might have written. But it is a scientific book as well and tells you more about the geology, topography, the plant and animal life of Madagascar, the people and their ways, than can be found in any other work in English. It is full of interesting information, shrewd observations on human nature, bits of quiet humor. The style is frankly American-English, often reminding the reader of Mark Twain. Mr. Osborn likes to receive and to give instruction, but has not written merely to instruct. He says that his aim was to make this book good reading. That is exactly what it is.

Madagascar is a beautiful book of more than 450 pages, bound in black cloth and stamped in gold leaf. It is profusely and interestingly illustrated with maps and photographs.

$5.00 Postpaid

REPUBLIC PUBLISHING CO.
421 West 21st Street, New York City.

For the enclosed $5.00 send me postpaid Madagascar, Land of the Man-Eating Tree, by Chase S. Osborn.

Name

Address

In full

tive that was like Beethovesque orchestration. In these heroic biographies the art is, rather, that of Beethoven's string quartets, and especially of the later ones in which four-stringed instruments are made to do the work of an orchestra. This analogy is adduced on the score of something a good deal more important than any mere dilettante subtleties of ordinary literary criticism, for it denotes a spirit rare in the literature of the West, if not indeed quite novel, and one which is destined to become less rare in the near future.

We of the West are like the heathen in that we think we shall be heard for our much speaking; and our writers for the most part, even some of the best of them, share this idolatry. Our books must be frequent; they must be long; they must be factual, exhaustive—and exhausting. It is only one more symptom of our prevailing malady of materialism, attacking the intellect itself. We have yet to learn and to value that kind of writing which gives us pages strewn with seedling-ideas to be picked up and nourished in the consciousness for what they may bring forth of our own. For the book, like the man, should be creative. Not "What does it tell me?" but "What does it tell me to tell myself?" For such is the chaos of the modern world that explicitness of instruction has ceased to be virtue; what we want is spiritual prompting. Like Wagner, we feel that "Henceforth the life-stream must flow not from without but from within."

There are, in the East, writings which are meant to be read only in order that they may be made the subject of prolonged and conscious meditation. To read them with a merely acquisitive intellect and to stop there is as futile as to peruse a chart of gymnastic exercises and expect to grow muscle without performing the motions. Romain Rolland's "Mahatma Gandhi" is such a book. It can be read through in two hours. But it contains material which can hardly be assimilated within the span of a single life-time. For it is packed with the germ-ideas of a new age and a new order of humanity. When one finishes his study of Tolstoi's "The Kingdom of God Is Within You," the classic exposition of non-violence as voiced in Europe at the close of the nineteenth century, there remains the feeling that wide margins of individual thinking have been left for the reader to do on his own account if he would relate this doctrine to common life. When one finishes his first reading of Rolland's "Gandhi" one feels that this margin of thinking left at the end of Tolstoi's work has been, to a large extent, completed, and, furthermore, that this thought has already in India been translated into the language of heroic action. The word has become flesh and, whether we wit or no, has dwelt among us. For Gandhi is a figure of prophecy. He is the oriental mystic become occidental man of action. One feels, on holding in his consciousness these germ-thoughts of such infinite potency, that he is entertaining the seeds of a new age. Here are the raw materials of the future, and all presented so quietly, so simply, with such serenity that the knowledge-mongers and the sensation-seekers would race past, never guessing this to be the seat of at once the new and the ancient wisdom.

LUCIEN PRICE

Scoundrels and Heroes

The Buccaneers of America. By John Esquemeling. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

MASTER JOHN ESQUEMELING, buccaneer (1645-1707), was a downright kind of man, and there is a dry insolence in the record that he made. He flings facts in your face with a take-it-or-leave-it air, and it is to his glory that he possesses the subtle qualities of unity and vigor of narration. Nor, spite of all the blood and the death and the pillage, shall you go unpaid for the reading of his tale, seeing that there stands, well revealed, the splendor of courage and of endurance. More, if you are so inclined, you can make of the story a kind of man-analysis, seeing that those of whom he writes, Sir Henry Mor-

IMPORTANT SPRING BOOKS

How to Write Short Stories (With Samples)

By RING W. LARDNER

Burton Rascoe says in the New York Tribune:

"I consider Mr. Lardner's the finest book of short stories by a living writer that has come to my attention since the publication of Sherwood Anderson's 'Winesburg, Ohio,' which is to say, one of the best books of short stories I know anything about.

"I have in mind a critical essay of vast dimensions, wherein I might make clear my reason for thinking that 'How to Write Short Stories' contains stories which are superior to anything O. Henry ever wrote, or that H. C. Bunner or Frank L. Stockton ever wrote, just as I see the reasons to be advanced for considering both Mr. Anderson and Mr. Lardner (though they have nothing in common except veracity of observation) to be superior as literary artists to even so competent a craftsman as Katherine Mansfield. To my mind there are three Americans who, at their best, are in the world's first rank of short story writers, and they are Sherwood Anderson, Willa Sibert Cather and Mr. Lardner.

"The best of the stories in 'How to Write Short Stories' are not couched in the illiterate Busher's idiom which gave Mr. Lardner his vogue, but in grammatical English of individual warmth, strength and power—a method of expression molded out of the vital elements of the native American language. They are authentic stories of American life, but the tragic or comic drama of them would not be alien to any occidental country."

Second printing. $2.00

Escape

By ALDEN BROOKS

"A fantastic adventure, which might easily be either broadly comic or thickly sentimental, but which from this story-teller's lips takes on romantic dignity and meaning. . . . I don't know when this general theme, or situation, has been so well treated since that masterpiece of H. G. Wells', 'The History of Mr. Polly.'" —Providence Journal.

$2.00

You Too

By ROGER BURLINGAME

"A remarkable first novel on the dangers of believing your own advertising literature; a vastly amusing novel, rollicking through experiences that under different treatment might have dripped with tragedy."—May Lamberton Becker in the Reader's Guide of the New York Evening Post.

$2.00

The Interpreter's House

By STRUTHERS BURT

"It strikes me as one of the most distinctive American novels in many years—brilliant in places, good all through, always interesting in story and stimulating in ideas. I won't say any more, but will just go out and talk about it to my friends."—Ernest Poole.

Third printing. $2.00

The Pulitzer Biography Prize

From Immigrant to Inventor By Michael Pupin

"A fascinating story," says The Nation.

Fourth large printing. $4.00

The Three Fountains By STARK YOUNG

"Mr. Young is one of those who find in foreign lands a sort of contemporary ancestry; the calm reasonableness of the ancients dwells in the kindly priest; the pagan spirit, in direct contact with nature, retaining the primitive rites, survives in the simple country folk. Stark Young sojourns among them like Ulysses in the Elysian Fields, a stranger, yet poignantly at home."—The Nation.

$2.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

gan, "our Jamaican hero who sacked Porto Bello, burnt Panama, etc.," and the bold Captain Cook, and the radiant Captain Sharp, as well as Basil Ringrose, gent., understood the arts of stimulating and controlling men, of exercising personality, of successful organization, of seizing upon the unusual as opportunity, of securing information and making it usable, quite as well as any modern captain of industry. So we find the makings of heroes in scoundrels, just as we discover the makings of scoundrels in heroes if we do but dig deep enough. Certainly, the pessimistic moralist will find much that is very shocking in the record, the weighing of men's fear of pain against their love of wealth by the torture test, for example, or the colossal assumption that might is right, or the disregard of established institutions, and all that sort of thing. But then, on the other hand, the vicious swashbuckling blades did things that command respect and call forth admiration. Roosevelt pushing on to the River of Doubt, Stanley penetrating Africa, Peary piercing to the Pole, all these had easy tasks compared with the work of the rascals who fought through the Panama jungles, who faced odds of an hundred to one in strange lands, who ventured to attack well-armed ships while they themselves were unarmed, who in trying to make the Magellan Straits passed from Pacific to Atlantic "by an unknown way never navigated before," that is, by rounding old Cape Stiff in a ship the like of which a modern sailor would condemn as unfit for a cruise in Delaware Bay. For in the vast and urgent business of living outside of institutions, important things were going on all the time, something vivid and alert was forever forward. As for the chronicler himself, old Esquemeling seems to have been a man of attractive character, and, certainly, his record must be counted as a really comprehensive treatment of historic facts, quite as important and valuable in its way as Cellini's Autobiography, or as Layamon's Brut, but vastly more entertaining than either.

CHARLES J. FINGER

American Documents

Sources and Documents Illustrating the American Revolution, 1764-1788, and the Formation of the Federal Constitution. Selected and edited by S. E. Morison. Oxford University Press. $3.

MR. SAMUEL MORISON, now professor of American history at Oxford University, but probably best known to readers of American history through his admirable "Maritime History of Massachusetts," has put us again in his debt by this modest but scholarly and extremely useful collection of documents. For the first time we have brought together in a volume of moderate size a really representative collection of sources for the history of the American Revolution, as distinguished from the military and diplomatic history of the War for Independence. The period is so defined as to include not merely the controversy with the mother country and the overthrow of the old regime but the work of reconstruction which followed, up to the ratification of the federal Constitution of 1787. The reader will find here not only the obvious material usually presented but much that is comparatively unfamiliar. Pains have been taken to secure accurate texts, and the value of the book is substantially increased by a well-considered introduction of some thirty pages. Especially significant, as coming from a New Englander lecturing at Oxford, is Mr. Morison's emphasis on the West and its problems. Along with the resolves of the Stamp Act Congress and the Massachusetts Circular Letter, one finds such comparatively unhackneyed material on frontier conditions and states of mind as the "Declaration and Remonstrance" of the Pennsylvania frontiersmen in 1764, and a county petition illustrating the Regulator movement in North Carolina. About half of Mr. Morison's introduction is given to bringing out the importance of this kind of material and introducing his readers to recent

A Putnam List Which Includes Reading for Thoughtful Persons

A. C.
Benson

MEMORIES AND FRIENDS

Reminiscences centering about Ruskin, Thomas Hare, Oscar Browning and other interesting figures of the past fifty years. It is a unique biography in which the author seldom appears. $4.50

Alexander
Woollcott

ENCHANTED AISLES

"Alec in Wonderland" the Christian Science Monitor calls Mr. Woollcott's delightful essays on life, letters and the most engaging personalities of the theater. $2.50

Helen Douglas Adams

THE ELFIN PEDLAR

AND TALES TOLD BY PIXY POOL

Charming, fanciful verse by a twelve-year-old girl with an amazing poetic gift. $2.50

David Morton

HARVEST

Notable verse by one of our finest lyricists. The author of "Ships in Harbor." $1.75

Fabian
Franklin

PLAIN TALKS ON ECONOMICS

Fundamental principles simply explained with a background of modern conditions. $2.50

Bacon
and Morse

THE REASONABLENESS OF THE LAW

A sound and readable treatise on constitutional law by Chas. W. Bacon and Franklyn S. Morse. $3.00

William McDougall

ETHICS AND SOME MODERN WORLD PROBLEMS

From a purely scientific and ethical point of view this distinguished Professor of Psychology at Harvard considers the disturbing problems of the world today. His discussion of immigration is particularly timely. $2.50

J. Arthur
Thomson

SCIENCE OLD AND NEW

Man's environment over a period of five hundred million years portrayed in a book that throws much light upon the dispute over evolution. $3.50

George H.
Green

THE MIND IN ACTION

Describing clearly the processes by which the mind works. A non-technical explanation for the layman. $2.00

Margaret Rivers
Larminie

DEEP MEADOWS

The author of "Echo" and "Search" has given us another novel that places her still higher in the ranks of the serious writers of our day. $2.00

Bernice
Brown

MEN OF EARTH

A deeply significant and romantic book of short stories portraying the life of settlers in the Northwestern States. $2.00

Mollie Panter-Downes

THE SHORELESS SEA

A sixteen-year-old girl wrote this remarkably fine novel of human emotions. London made it a best-seller. $2.00

At All Booksellers

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

2 West 45th Street

New York

studies which have appeared dealing with this subject.

Recognition of formerly neglected aspects of the Revolution does not, however, prevent adequate attention to the more familiar constitutional issues. The editor has brought together the well-known but not generally accessible arguments of such pamphleteers on both sides as Soane Jenyns, Daniel Dulany, James Otis, and James Wilson. It was obviously impracticable to reproduce all of these in full, but the excerpts are sufficiently extensive to present the argument fairly. It would have been worth while, however, to print with the excerpts from John Adams's "Novanglus" essays, something from his loyalist opponent, "Massachusettsensis." One of the less familiar documents is the Royal Instructions to the British peace commission of 1778, included primarily to indicate what the ministry was willing to do in the matter of constitutional adjustment.

In general, the reader who is accustomed to the traditional treatment of this period will be impressed with the relative attention given to State and local proceedings. The State constitutions chosen for reproduction are those of Virginia and Pennsylvania. The Virginia Declaration of Rights is given in full and excerpts from the corresponding Pennsylvania document are so presented as to facilitate comparison. As a Massachusetts man, Mr. Morison seems to have "leaned over backward" in not adding the Massachusetts constitution of 1780, representing certainly a somewhat different state of mind from that of either Virginia or Pennsylvania in 1776.

The political theory of the Federal Convention is illustrated by excerpts from the notes of Madison and Yates; the editor has not kept to such beaten tracks as the compromises on representation and commerce, but has included matter on topics like "Corruption and Government," "Foreigners and the Senate," and sectional feeling between East and West. The selection of documents relating to the struggle for ratification is doubtless difficult because of an embarrassment of riches. Mr. Morison has limited himself to one letter from Gouverneur Morris, reproduced from the Washington Manuscripts in the Library of Congress, and a series of excerpts from the debates of the Virginia ratifying convention. To these excerpts he gives over fifty pages, about one-seventh of the whole space given to documents and more than is allowed for the debates in the Federal Convention. Perhaps the most striking omission is the absence of any selection from "The Federalist" or from any of the Anti-Federalist pamphlets.

EVARTS B. GREENE

The Art of Singing

Singer's Pilgrimage. By Blanche Marchesi. Small, Maynard and Company. $4.

ONE does not need books these days to remind us that singing, as an art, is on the decline. Whether it is that instrumentalists are more and more claiming those popular affections formerly held almost exclusively by vocalists, so that the perfection once demanded from the latter is now sought in the former, certain it is that singing, as a past generation knew it, is fast becoming a legend of the studio. The great principles laid down by the Garcias and the Lampertis, the pure style inculcated by Mathilde Marchesi are no longer the gospel of the singer—not because there are none left to teach them, but because the public has forgotten them, and the student no longer needs them. No one could remind us of these principles better than Blanche Marchesi, because no one has ever had greater opportunities to learn them. The daughter of Mathilde and Salvatore Marchesi, she was born and raised in one of the greatest vocal studios the world has ever known. It was a studio that sent forth such operatic singers as Melba, Eames, Gerster, Krauss, Calvé, and other great artists, so that, as she justly claims, "for years the directors of the world's stages would come to our house in search of new talent." Her description of this environment, her discussion of her mother's famous pupils, and the intimate glimpses she gives of many

Multiplying Bookbuyers in Chicago

If only the "literati" bought books booksellers would starve—and it is traditional that the "literati" do not buy. They borrow.

The "bacon and beans" public is also the bookbuying public, and it will consume books on the same scale that it consumes bacon and beans, when books are as well advertised as are bacon and beans.

The Chicago Daily News has for a decade been enthusiastically and successfully working for the "quantity consumption" in Chicago of desirable books. With its internationally famous "Wednesday Book Page" The Daily News reaches and influences the great majority of the "book prospects" in Chicago and its suburbs. The book-buying public looks to The Wednesday Book Page as a guide to correct bookbuying.

To reach this vast, prosperous, ready-to-buy army of book prospects publishers who know Chicago place their messages in

The Chicago Daily News First in Chicago

N. B. The Daily News publishes more book advertising than any other newspaper, daily or Sunday, in Chicago.

other celebrities, though at times somewhat malicious, are always interesting. Her whole story of the Garcia family—Manuel Garcia the first, and his three remarkable children, Mme Viardot, Mme Malibran, and Manuel Garcia the second (the last the discoverer of the laryngoscope, and the teacher of Mathilde Marchesi, Jenny Lind, Stockhausen, and others of great repute), her "fourteen points" for teaching, her excellent advice to students, and, above all, her chapter on style make this book the most valuable that any singer has published since that of Lilli Lehmann. One must stress the chapter on style because it was that in which she as a singer, and her mother as a teacher, most excelled. She lays great stress upon the Garcia method, which, she declares, the whole world ought to adopt as a general standard. Yet it is doubtful whether she or her mother ever applied that method absolutely correctly. For Blanche Marchesi herself was distinguished more for her finish of interpretation than for her voice, which, to many, was most disagreeable; while Marchesi taught the pernicious "coup de glotte," which, her daughter claims, is an expression that was used by Garcia himself, and has always been misinterpreted as a stroke of the glottis, though it merely signifies the union of the vocal cords when the sound is made. Moreover, it used to be claimed, by one who assisted for years Mathilde Marchesi, that the latter was better for sopranos than for contraltos, and better still for style than for voice training, and that she often used to say, "Tell the pupils to be prepared vocally before they come to me." However that may be, one finds throughout this book many invaluable remarks on vocal teaching, though one wearies at times of that old refrain of teachers in general—the ingratitude of pupils. This Blanche Marchesi chants for herself and her mother, along with many other grievances that stamp her own personality as most unpleasant. But one can well overlook such a fault in a volume of such precious contents.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Books in Brief

Kostas Palamas. Royal Blossom, or Trisevyene. Translated by Aristides E. Phourides. Yale University Press. $2.

This play from the modern Greek is quiet and humane, though it is tragic. Trisevyene, the heroine, a pure and impulsive girl, is sacrificed to the stupidity of a town which nevertheless adores her. Thus the world, Palamas seems to say, clumsily mishandles the finest things it has, even while it caresses them. The symbolism is rather pale, and the people are bodiless; but the scene is as clear as the best of Greeks could have made it, the story is touching, and the writing is rich. Mr. Phourides, who here completed his third volume of translations from Palamas, has performed a valuable service in making better known an interesting contemporary European poet.

Saint Helena. By M. A. Aldanov. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

The threads of history and of purely imaginative narrative have been laced into a tight strand in this story, which seems to catch the essence of the final isolation of Napoleon. The spiritual significance of that episode is mirrored in a style which is compact and sparingly adorned; the story has simplicity as well as vitality.

The Long Walk of Samba Diouf. By Jerome and Jean Tharaud. Translated by Willis Steel. Duffield and Company. $1.75.

There is a curious remoteness in this story of the Senegalese and their reactions to the iron stamp of militarism; it might be the record of some early exploitation of the African native instead of the fictional reflection of what happened day before yesterday. One finds the book an interesting study of primitive impulses forced into unfamiliar expression; the jungle and the junker are shoulder to shoulder.

Rapture. By Richmond Brooks Barrett. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Written in a leisurely manner about a leisure class, "Rapture" proves to be a work of considerably more than average acumen, peopled with characters which—even though they do not sink deeply into one's sympathy—have been allowed to develop naturally and to take on the colors of life. Mr. Barrett has drawn a group portrait, in which each figure is distinct and in which the relationships are fundamentally faithful to reality.

Coffins for Two. By Vincent Starrett. Covici-McGee Company. $2.

Echoes of Poe and Machen sounds faintly through these short stories, with their deliberate pursuit of horror and their even more deliberate ornamentation. One wonders whether the tales might not have gained momentum—which is assuredly what one desires in stories of mystery—if the author had cut away some of the trappings. They seem to pass before the eye like the animal wagons in a circus parade; one scarcely sees the tiger because the cage is so glittering.

Streets of Night. By John Dos Passos. George H. Doran Company. $2.

The success of Mr. Dos Passos's extremely literal manner depends largely upon his subject matter. When in "Three Soldiers" his subject was in itself extraordinarily interesting the book was important, but when, as in the present novel, his material is not especially fresh the effect is flat. Adolescent adventures in art and sex are not novel and they require more than good reporting to arouse much interest.

The Book of Blanche. By Dorothy Richardson. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

The ability which has gone into the fashioning of this novel is evident but not sufficiently disciplined. The author has drawn a clear portrait and left out the shadows. Written with a greater measure of repose, the book would have gained in strength. Miss Richardson insists that the reader's emotions shall be pressed continuously against the emery-wheel of her imagination, unmindful of the fact that a few sparks may be just as powerful as a shower of them.

True Travellers. A Tramp's Opera in Three Acts. By William H. Davies. With Decorations by William Nicholson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A mildly amusing beggars' opera by the author of "The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp." Mr. Davies is hardly a playwright, but he is utterly ingenuous toward his worthless and attractive characters, and he has put into their mouths a number of songs of the sort which he is uniquely qualified to write. Admirers of his poetry will be charmed with the book; it will have no claim on others.

Birth. By Zona Gale. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

The five years which have elapsed since the first appearance of "Birth" have provided few novels maintaining an equal level of artistic excellence; the reissuing of the novel, now that Miss Gale is upon a higher rung of the ladder of sales, should establish this fact. To catch the genuine flavor of American village life, and to vitalize the reality which lies beneath its drab routine and its petty monotony, is an achievement of mark, and it is this which Miss Gale accomplished in "Birth." By a flash of insight, sometimes a mere turn of phrase, she illuminates the stuff of existence; details take on dignity and significance. The little town of Borage—a warmer and a more living embodiment of Main Street than Mr. Lewis's—is presented in all its limitations, all its emphatic trivialities, and yet one's sympathy is captured and held. Against this background, the gentle life tragedy of Marshall Pitt—a wistful, indecisive little idealist—is delicately unfolded. He is a being with no flourish, no positive attractiveness, and yet drawn with a touch of humanity to which the reader is immediately responsive. His story is one of

Brentano's Bon Voyage Book Boxes

Don't let your friends sail without one. It will insure them many pleasant hours on shipboard. Prices: $5, $10, $15, $20, etc.

Personal selection can be made, or BRENTANO'S will gladly use their best judgment in choosing the new and most popular Books and Magazines.

Write, or wire, name of recipient, giving price of assortment desired, the name of vessel and date of sailing, and delivery will be promptly made to Steamer.

BRENTANO'S

BOOKSELLERS TO THE WORLD

FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK CITY

Some Contemporary Americans

THE PERSONAL EQUATION
IN LITERATURE

By Percy H. Boynton

CATHER	TARKINGTON
FROST	DREISER
MASTERS	CABELL
SANDBURG	O'NEILL
LOWELL	MENCKEN
WHARTON	BRADFORD

$2.00, postpaid $2.10

The University of Chicago Press
Chicago · Illinois

ARTHUR B. DAVIES

ESSAYS ON THE MAN AND HIS ART

By

DUNCAN PHILLIPS : DWIGHT WILLIAMS
ROYAL CORTISZOZ : FRANK JEWETT MATHER
EDWARD W. ROOT : GUSTAVUS A. EISEN

Being number three of the Phillips Publications. A beautifully conceived volume, of quarto size, bound in boards, in a slip case, and containing forty reproductions of the Artist's work in black and white and a frontispiece exquisitely executed in full color. Printed on hand-laid paper by the Riverside Press. Net $10.00.

For Sale By

PHILLIPS MEMORIAL GALLERY

OFFICE: 1218 CONNECTICUT AVENUE
WASHINGTON, D. C.

—AND—

BRICK ROW BOOK SHOP, INC.

NEW HAVEN :: 19 E. 47TH ST., N. Y. :: PRINCETON

A limited number of copies now ready

John Brown, A Biography

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"Mr. Villard . . . has served humanity by making this record."—William Allen White in the Emporia Gazette.

"It at once becomes the standard, and probably final authority on its theme."—London Times.

"Mr. Villard's book is the labor of a master of men. His book is a great production."—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

"I can only say after reading from first to last its more than 700 pages that I have never encountered anything this side of Gibbon's 'Rome' which has made me feel more the personal power of a single work."—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

"Perhaps in thus dramatically fashioning his volume Mr. Villard obeyed an instinct rather than acted upon a preconceived plan; that is often the case with great work, where a writer's feelings are deeply enlisted. Be this as it may, the merit and charm are none the less; he has seized well a splendid opportunity and has written one of the great biographies of our literature."—John T. Morse, Jr., Editor of American Statesmen Series, in the Atlantic Monthly.

With many portraits and other illustrations.

In one volume, 8vo. 740 pages. Price $5.00; by mail prepaid, $5.26.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

4 Park Street

Boston, Mass.

those narratives in a minor key in which the values do not all lie upon the surface, and Miss Gale has not failed to sound its depths.

From Whitman to Sandburg in American Poetry. A Critical Survey. By Bruce Weirick. The Macmillan Company. $2.

The most consecutive account to date of modern American poetry. The volumes of Louis Untermeyer and Amy Lowell are collections of more or less brilliant essays; this is a book—even, it should be said, a textbook. Mr. Weirick has tried to describe all the influences, social and artistic, that have directed the stream of verse since Whitman. His instincts are on the side of democracy, nationality, and robustness; hence his inadequacy in dealing with the "back-waters" of Frost and Robinson, his inability to understand the finer futility, his impatience with the "art group," his utter failure to do Emily Dickinson justice. To devote thirty-five pages to Whitman, Titan that he is, and less than two pages to Emily Dickinson is to commit a cardinal error for a writer of literary history. So that while he has treated a great many more poets than come into any other book upon the subject, and has written with a genuine if somewhat elementary enthusiasm, and has furnished a guide for college students in a certain field of American literature, he cannot claim to have composed a really original or permanently stimulating volume.

Contributors to This Issue

SINCLAIR LEWIS, just returned from England, will act as The Nation's special correspondent for the presidential campaign in Gopher Prairie, Zenith, and other centers of political thought.

"AN OPERATOR" desires to have his identity withheld from the public.

WINTHROP D. LANE, author of "Civil War in West Virginia," wrote the report for the Committee of Inquiry on Coal and Civil Liberties headed by Zechariah Chafee.

NATHAN FINE is associated with Solon de Leon in editing "The American Labor Year Book."

GLENN FRANK is editor of the Century Magazine.

CARL SANDBURG, author of the Rootabaga Stories, is primarily a poet; "Corn Husker" and "Smoke and Steel" are perhaps his most representative volumes.

HARRY HANSEN, who calls himself only a "reviewer," is in reality literary editor of the Chicago Daily News, and a critic of enviable reputation.

ARTHUR GUTERMAN is the author of many volumes of ballads and lyrics.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD's "Parable of Paradise" won a special award in The Nation's 1924 Poetry Contest.

PHILIP GUEDALLA in his "Second Empire" set new standards for the writing of history.

RUTH E. ALEXANDER is a resident of Cape Town and a life-long friend of Olive Schreiner.

MARK VAN DOREN, assistant professor of English at Columbia University, will succeed Irita Van Doren as literary editor of The Nation.

CLARENCE W. ALVORD is professor of history at the University of Minnesota.

CHARLES J. FINGER, editor of All's Well, perennially interested in adventure, has just published a volume of sketches called "In Lawless Lands."

EVARTS B. GREENE, long professor of history at the University of Illinois, has recently joined the faculty of Columbia University.

HENRIETTA STRAUS, music critic for The Nation, will act as correspondent from various European music centers during the next year.

Drama

All God's Chillun

MR. EUGENE O'NEILL has at last hit upon tragedy. He has the theme, the intensity, the terror and exaltation. All this will be missed by those who see the play through a curtain of words. Such words as miscegenation, for instance. It will be missed by those who indulge in sociological reflections. Mr. O'Neill has fortunately gone much deeper.

He starts with a fact, a credible fact. There is the city slum; there is Jim Harris; there is Ella Downey. It is easy to object: Why mate a first-rate Negro with a third-rate white woman? Because these are the facts. They are credible; they are nearly inevitable. Only this woman would have married a Negro in America today. Only this Negro, on the other hand, would have had both the mentality and the devotion. The woman has been flung aside by a scoundrel of her own race. Jim loves her and wants to save her. In her stark loneliness and misery she accepts. An educated woman would never have found herself in quite that position; an educated woman, even if it were conceivable for her to risk the consequences of this step, would never have revealed in sanity or madness what needed to be revealed, what is beyond all else the tragic theme—the immemorial, ineradicable character of race prejudice.

It is in revealing this dark and secret thing that Mr. O'Neill reaches a height hitherto inaccessible to him. It is profoundly impressive and true that Ella was not happy in France since she took her soul and its memories and instincts with her; it is a master-stroke that she does not want Jim to pass his bar examination, since that would destroy the ultimate feeling of superiority to which she clings and which, she thinks, sustains her.

The case of Negro and White is a terrible case, an excessive one, a case surrounded with myth, fear, terror. But it does not stand alone. All deep divisions or supposedly deep divisions have a like effect. A Gentile wife at some moment of crisis muttering the word Jew under her breath, a French wife, in 1915, the word Hun—these are other symbols out of which comparable tragedies could have been built. And as Mr. O'Neill's tragedy points to these others, so would those others have pointed to his. I do not mean that he has not very honestly and concretely dealt with his Negro man and his white woman. But the problem he has selected cleaves so near the bone of human life itself that it possesses a transcendent symbolic character. There are not many such themes in the world; this is one of them.

It is amusing to contemplate the state of mind of the people who were determined to be shocked by this play, of the critics who excused themselves for trying to view it objectively, of the Gerry Society which, at least for the opening night, refused to issue the permit that would have made possible the performance of the prologue by white and colored children. It is amusing since all these things serve but to emphasize the truth of Mr. O'Neill's delineation of Ella Downey's soul. He created Ella Downey and at once found the world full of Ella Downeys.

The production of the Provincetown Players is notably fine. Mr. Paul Robson is a superb actor, extraordinarily sincere and eloquent. Miss Mary Blair was a little halting in the earlier scenes; later she rose to the occasion and was literally thrilling at moments. I must not omit to mention excellent work by Frank Wilson and Dora Cole, nor the slum scene by Mr. Throckmorton, nor the directing of Mr. James Light. I have seen far more beauty and intelligence and mobility than there are in this production and this play. I have seen nothing that so deeply gave me an emotion comparable to what the Greeks must have felt at the dark and dreadful actions set forth by the older Attic dramatists. And these actions, too, had their origin in inexpugnable myth and ancient terror.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 11, 1924

No. 3075

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS.....	665
EDITORIALS:
La Follette to the Front.....	668
Railway Workers' Rights.....	669
Ile St. Louis.....	669
Victor Herbert.....	670
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Toward Monogamy. By Charlotte Perkins Gilman.....	671
AFTER THE FRENCH ELECTIONS. By Ida Treat.....	673
THE RACE PROBLEM IN THE CARIBBEAN:
I. The English Way. By Robert Herrick.....	675
PREMONITIONS. By Art Young.....	677
NOGIN—INDUSTRIALIST AND REVOLUTIONIST. By Clinton W. Gilbert.....	678
THIRD-PARTY VIBRATIONS. By William Hard.....	679
OUR NAVY AT WORK. By Benjamin C. Marsh.....	680
A COMMUNICATION:
The Pioneer Youth of America. By Norman Thomas.....	681
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.....	681
CORRESPONDENCE.....	682
TEXAS. By William A. Norris.....	683
BOOKS:
The President's Mind. By C. Hartley Grattan.....	684
Stable Money. By Henry Raymond Mussey.....	684
Two Sophisticates. By J. W. Krutch.....	685
Greek Feminism. By Clara M. Smertenko.....	686
A Romance of Science. By Ernest Gruening.....	686
The Library and the Community. By John Cotton Dana.....	687
Labors of the Sun. By Edward Skinner King.....	688
Books in Brief.....	688
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
White Australia. By G. C. T. Giles.....	689
Russia, America, Japan.....	690
Position of the Industrial Bank.....	691
The Political Shift in Germany.....	692

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY

IRITA VAN DOREN

MANAGING EDITOR

LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK

H. L. MENCKEN

CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IN FRANCE the President is like the British king—a figurehead rather than a political leader. He is zealously kept out of politics. After all, leaders of two French republics have made themselves kings. The third republic has been consistently chary of strong men in the presidency. Clemenceau fought bitterly, when he was Premier and Poincaré President, against presidential interference with the conduct of affairs, and Clemenceau himself failed of election to the presidency largely because the French Parliament felt him too big a man for a job which it prefers to keep small. The French constitution is elastic enough: the definition of powers is largely a matter of custom. Millerand has always sought to extend his power as President; with Poincaré as Premier, Millerand found his task easy. These two were at one time credited with meditating a fascist revolution; they were jointly responsible both for the fateful Ruhr policy and for the institution of the decree-laws by which the Premier was empowered to decree tax measures without consulting Parliament. More than that, Millerand ventured far outside of the Olympian and non-partisan role hitherto affected by French presidents and actually made speeches before the last election urging Frenchmen to vote for the candidates of the Bloc National.

Hence the bitterness of the Left against him. They feel that at the election France repudiated not only Poincaré but Millerand, too, and they demand his resignation.

EDOUARD HERRIOT, probable next Premier of France, made, according to the Paris correspondent of the New York Herald-Tribune, an extremely significant statement about the Morgan loan to France:

When I was called to confer with Millerand a short time ago, it was not for political purposes, but with regard to the financial situation. I willingly gave the President the assurance that we, the Radical Socialists, considered it would be our first duty to safeguard the equilibrium of the budget. But I went no further. . . .

I was informed by Millerand and de Marsal [Minister of Finance under Poincaré] that before the American financiers agreed to what is known as the Morgan loan of $100,000,000 for the recovery of the franc, they asked for a guaranty in gold and other rather general political guaranties.

The Bank of France was obliged to place funds to the credit of the money lenders amounting to 528,000,000 in gold francs as a guaranty for the loan. This amount fully covered the loan. Aside from this, the French Government agreed to engagements of a general character. This method of treating France like Turkey is extraordinary.

Later M. Herriot seems to have been forced to issue a diplomatic denial, and to disavow any criticism of the bankers. The significant fact remains that more and more the political governments of the world are yielding real power to the financiers—and the financiers act as dictators, guided by their own best judgment and controlled by no democratic system of checks and balances. They govern the world, and there is none to say them nay.

THESE FINANCIERS are not mere sons of monarchs. Their judgment is worth far more than that of the kings of old. There are no hereditary kingdoms in finance, and the sons of great bankers soon lose control of the power of their own wealth. These men reach power, in the main, by virtue of their own ability. It is, however, a one-sided ability, and it is a menace to the world until it is faced by some democratic system capable of holding its class interest in check. But it must be granted that, warped as may be its social vision, the influence of finance is at present cast in international affairs in the main for sanity. The old empires and nationalistic rivalries mean nothing to it—though it may be that it is building economic empires whose rivalries will be even more destructive than the old. In the Dawes plan it devised an improvement upon the rivalries of nationalist politicians. Ignace Seipel, the chancellor of Austria who has just been shot by a harebrained railroad worker, will be remembered as the man who delivered Austria to the international bankers and thereby achieved a temporary stabilization of values which saved many a life though it also meant an end to many a social vision.

THE SCANDALOUS BILL which the House of Representatives passed to give Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford on his own terms is probably doomed to defeat through the energy of Senator Norris in inducing the Committee on Agriculture of his wing of the Capitol to vote against reporting in favor of the measure. Instead the committee recommends Senator Norris's own bill for continued government ownership, with operation either by the nation or by private interests under federal control. This action does not end the people's fight; it only changes its character. For the Norris bill faces great opposition in both branches of Congress. Since Henry Ford made his offer there have been other bids, with better terms, and there is now a plan to make a further study of Muscle Shoals with a view to offering it to public bidding upon specified terms. This would be only a little less foolish than capitulation to Henry Ford. The nation ought not to dream of surrendering this vast water-power to private interests. It is an incalculable natural resource which ought to be used as the corner-stone of a great, permanent policy of federal water-power development.

NO COMMUNIST can consistently protest against Senator La Follette's insistence upon the difference between his progressive group with its old-fashioned belief in the efficacy of democratic control, and the Communist program. The Communists have made their own program clear enough. "The Workers Party prides itself on being a communist party," says a statement by its own executive committee; "that means that it considers its work to build up and lead the forces which will bring about a proletarian revolution in the United States and establish a soviet form of government and the dictatorship of the proletariat." It was with such a program of "boring from within" that the Communists hoped to determine the action of the St. Paul convention which Senator La Follette has so explicitly disavowed. "I do not question their right under the Constitution," he says, "to submit their issues to the people"; but he believes it would be a fatal error to admit them as "an integral part" of the new progressive organization. The Communists, after all, must blame themselves if they find themselves thus looked upon as outsiders trying to creep into the progressive camp; they have made their hopes of capturing it too plain. But it would be a misfortune if the progressives began to adopt such doctrinal tests as have marred the good name of the American Federation of Labor. Let them draw up their own program, and let those subscribe who will; that is far better than to verge on the business of heresy trials.

HERESY TRIALS are always rather silly. The spectacle of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the year 1924, solemnly trying Bishop William Montgomery Brown, author of "Communism vs. Christianity," for heresy, on the ground of statements contained in that book, was ridiculous. Of course Bishop Brown is a heretic; his whole book is a scathing arraignment of absurdities in the conventional interpretation of church doctrines. But his accusers were put to it to decide among themselves what was church doctrine, and the bishop doubtless had a good time watching them stumble. Yet he himself faced as difficult an ethical question as they. He had found a new, to him more adequate, "symbolic" interpretation of doctrines which others still took literally. He knew very well that his interpretation differed from that of his associates in the church; he knew too that even in churches the interpretation of old beliefs changes. Should he have stayed in, and fought for his new conceptions, or have stepped outside? Every individual is faced by such questions scores of times in a lifetime, and obviously the problem is beyond intelligent decision by any hierarchy, jury, or body of officials; the individual conscience must reach its own conclusions.

THE VIOLENT CLAMOR of citizens of Centralia, Washington, was doubtless primarily responsible for sending to jail eight members of the International Workers of the World when four soldiers of the American Legion were shot at the time of the Armistice Day parade in 1919. The evidence indicated that the members of the I. W. W. had shot in self-defense, but the mob spirit of the town demanded a sacrifice on the altar of patriotism. Hence the verdict, which six out of the twelve men in the jury have since repudiated. Other citizens, too, have had a change of heart, for the drive begun in 1922 to raise a fund of $250,000 to erect a monument to the four legionnaires has ended in a pitiable fizzle. A go-getter was hired at $500 a week to gather in the shekels, but the people of Centralia had taken second thought by 1922, and only $16,500 was collected. This all went toward the salary of the go-getter, and he recently began suit for an unpaid balance. Isn't it about time that Governor Hart, too, took second thought and freed the victims of an hysteria of which Centralia itself now appears to be ashamed?

SUPPOSE THAT IN SOME IMAGINABLE FUTURE there should be a small remnant of white Christian people left in an America which had been conquered and colonized by a race of different color and religion. Suppose the conquerors, after using all the familiar forms of economic and religious coercion to proselytize these few Christians, should finally say to them: "After all, your religion is not a religion, exactly; it is only a form of barbaric worship. The Christian symbols and observances are largely relics of old, half-forgotten, and unmentionable rites. As modern governors of a backward people, wishing nothing but your gradual transformation into civilized persons capable of full citizenship, we find it necessary to end the superstitious practices which comprise the Christian worship. To which end we have determined that children shall no longer learn these archaic, dubious rituals, and that . . ." The rest of the long memorial is easy to imagine. And it is easy to imagine that the last Christians would say in reply something like this: "We cannot comply with this order, no matter what the penalty may be, because this order would violate our religion and also destroy it. . . . To comply . . . would be to violate the laws of our tribe and to betray our forefathers, who have taught us to worship God from the beginning of time."

WHICH IS JUST WHAT THE PUEBLO INDIANS have said in a letter to Charles H. Burke, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who in a rather disingenuous effort to stamp out the ancient religious practices of the Pueblos has ordered that the year of religious education given to certain of the children be abandoned and that all the children be kept continuously in the government schools. The Indians maintain that their right to continue this religious training is guaranteed them by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo with Mexico, under which they came into the United States. They say that they welcome the government schools and are willing to keep their children in them an extra year to make up for the year of religious training. But they add:

This religion is many thousands of years old among our people and is more important to each one of us than money, horses, land, or anything else in the world. It teaches us about God and the earth and about our duty to God, to earth, and to one another. The white people have a Bible which is printed. We have a Bible which is not printed, but is passed on by memory from the old to the young, and it contains our knowledge of God, our forms of prayer, and our rules of life.

Whatever the legal case of the Pueblo Indians may be, whether or not they can be forced into subjection by Commissioner Burke and his subordinates, they have an impregnable human case. A country that pretended to religious liberty or to an intelligent interest in preserving the beliefs and ceremonies of an ancient religion for the enlightenment and enrichment of its own culture would make every effort to adapt its laws and institutions to the customs of the people it ruled and would respect the stubborn devotion that holds them to their faith.

SOMEWHERE ON THE WIDE SEA, bound for Poland—which is not his home—is Nicholas Manseвич, a victim of the American inquisition. The Germans tore Belgian men from their work and from their families and sent them into Germany to slave; the American Department of Justice and the American Department of Labor tore Nicholas Manseвич from his work and from his family; they ruined his life, dissipated his earnings, lost him his home, left his wife and children without help or support, tried his case at secret hearings, finally packed him aboard a boat, and shipped him to an alien country which has acquired the district from which he came and which will welcome him with the same sort of warm hospitality he has met in the United States. Manseвич's "crime" is doubtful; he was presumably arrested on the charge of having inflammatory literature in his possession. The defense claimed that the literature was planted—and badly planted at that. It was delivered at his house in a wagon, but his wife had no knowledge of it and refused to pay the charges. The Department of Justice agents, by some miracle arriving simultaneously, tried to make her pay for it, but when she refused, they took it to his place of work, where without a warrant they arrested him and took him to jail. That was in 1921. When, the other day, a final appeal in the case was made to Attorney General Stone, he was unable to retrace the series of steps taken by his predecessors. And so, like others of his fellow-countrymen, Manseвич has been sent to Europe as a sort of special emissary to spread abroad our shame.

OUR SUPERPATRIOTS were probably tremendously stirred at learning that the French Government had issued an order requiring all American jazz players to leave the country within five days. One proverb of which our 100-per-centers seem never to have heard is that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and while they have been busy excluding, deporting, exploiting, and insulting all the other peoples of the world it has never occurred to them that somebody might retaliate. The jazz industry is apparently the only one in which we are so supreme that we have been able to enter the European market and rout native competition, the press dispatches saying that the deportation order was issued upon complaint of French musicians who found themselves out of a job. We should prefer to think that the order was due to outraged musical taste, and we agree with our superpatriots at least to the extent of hoping that these exported jazz players will not be dumped back upon our shores. Perhaps their permanent stay abroad could be arranged in return for a loan sufficiently large to restore the franc to parity.

NUMEROUS AS MAGAZINES are in America, the field is not crowded unless it be in the corner devoted to the cheaper fiction. Perhaps the greatest weakness is among those journals which must be written by specialists for general readers. Of these the Theatre Arts Monthly, for two years a quarterly but now issued at monthly intervals, deserves particular notice. It chronicles the more important developments in the theater in considerable detail, and in a language not too professional for any alert person interested in the exciting world of the stage. What Theatre Arts Monthly does for dramatic matters the quarterly Progressive Education does for education. A chronicle, it is also a running criticism, given less, however, to arguments about theory than to illustrations of practice in schools which show themselves adapted to this new age for which certain elder methods of teaching have proved so inadequate. Parents as well as teachers will relish its report and comment. The Modern Quarterly aims to attract enlightened readers who are at once radical and metaphysical, serious and educable. Without exhibiting many of the charms of literature, it knows how to advocate them; it is consistent in its demands upon the intelligence of its readers and its effort to bring the whole range of human affairs under its vigorous scrutiny. It is badly printed and well informed, contentious and courageous.

ANOTHER judicial outrage is reported, this time from Ottawa. There a poor, hard-working bootlegger has been hauled into court by a hard-hearted government to show cause why he should not pay an income tax upon his profits. Fortunately, this man is no spineless person, but one sensitive to his duty and his obligation to his profession. So he has properly set up the unanswerable defense that the state is without jurisdiction inasmuch as it cannot tax an illegal business. Plainly if it does so it becomes a partner in wrongdoing, sharing the profits of an illegitimate occupation. The case is of vast moment to one of our own leading industries—the sale of liquor—for if a precedent is established we may have Secretary Mellon striving to collect taxes from the greatest creators of that free capital which Mr. Mellon is so eager to keep out of tax-free securities. Just now the bootlegging industry is building up a new social aristocracy with such speed that we shall soon find ourselves no longer bowing down to the lords and ladies of oil but admiring the yachts and palaces of those who grow rich yet are tax-free and happy. We confess, though, that if we were that Ottawa judge we should find it advisable to start at once for the North Pole or Central Africa. He reserved judgment. So should we—indefinitely. For if he sustains the bootlegger he deprives his government of huge revenues and helps him to immunity, and if he condemns the bootlegger to pay he legitimizes an occupation the king's law officers are sworn, we suppose, to root out. Who will care hereafter if he is asked that trying old catch question: Have you ceased beating your wife?

La Follette to the Front

AS a patriot Senator La Follette has decided. To his letter on the political situation we can attach no other meaning than that he has finally come to the conclusion that there is nothing to be hoped from either of the old parties and that he is ready, God helping him, to raise a standard of revolt to which honest men may repair. We count it glorious news, for we do not believe that either party will undergo a sea-change overnight and so purge itself as to win his indorsement in the next three weeks. The leopard might as readily change his spots, the Ethiopian his skin. We are not asking ourselves at this hour whether Mr. La Follette will win or not. We are merely giving profoundest thanks that in one of the darkest hours the Republic has known there is still one man in political life who will not bow the knee to Baal.

We count it a most favorable omen that this man is one whom, but seven years ago, no one would honor and all in the seats of the mighty affected to despise. For, in that hour of supreme testing, Robert La Follette kept his faith and his soul clean. Not one jot did he yield to the public clamor of those who all but thirsted for his blood; and he has seen his popularity steadily return among thinking people, and been reelected to the Senate by the largest majority ever given to any one in his State. We are not beyond being impressed with the fact that the Englishman whose war career is most strikingly like that of Senator La Follette now rules England. But best of all is still the circumstance that this coming election is not to be left to the guilty reactionaries in both parties, but that a ticket is to be in the field for which an upright American may vote without apology and without shame, registering his protest against the sale of the government.

To have no one come forward in protest under these circumstances would have been a dreadful thing. It would have meant that we were far gone in our complacent acceptance of the abasement of the Republic, that true patriotism was all but dead among us. From that humiliation Senator La Follette has saved us. We believe that the uprightness of his motives will be recognized from one end of the country to the other, precisely as those close to him in public life have never doubted either his sincerity or his absolute honesty. We are aware, of course, of the shower of abuse which will again descend upon him. The holders of special privilege, whose enemy he has always been, will leave no stone unturned to defeat him. Their servile press will renew its attacks. They will proclaim him the "apostle of discontent" and denounce him as a dangerous demagogue, a menace to prosperity, and all the rest. The Republican Party, whose defeat his candidacy will probably insure, will seek to brand him as a traitor. None the less, we believe that his message will stir great hosts who are sick unto death of leaping from political frying pan to political fire, who long for one man upon whose honesty and sincerity they can rely. And we have no hesitation in saying that the extent of his vote and the number of States he will carry will amaze the public when the votes are counted.

Who can measure the educational value of the campaign which we now have in prospect? Were there to be no third ticket we should be in merely for a campaign of mutual recrimination, Republicans and Democrats seeking to portray each other as the more corrupt. With Mr. La Follette in the field, there is the certainty that we shall have the blame placed where it belongs, and that we shall have the opportunity to get down to facts and principles. Without him it would surely be one of the duller of campaigns. With him in the fray men will have to think, and, if the economic signs do not mislead, multitudes will have the enforced leisure to debate and consider. They will not be frightened off by charges of radicalism. Nor can he be called purely destructive when the statute-books teem with laws passed by his party which he first championed. And if he brings forward new ideas once more, there will be tens of thousands ready to consider a new order where the old has proved so untrustworthy.

There will be plenty to disagree with this or that plank which Mr. La Follette will advocate, but the fact remains that here is a man whose arrival in the White House would of itself mean that the sordid and corrupt atmosphere of Washington would be supplanted by sweeping drafts of fresh and pure air. Not that the millennium would be here. Mr. La Follette would be the last to proclaim himself a political genius. He has arrived at many positions only after arduous efforts to occupy less radical posts. He has not yet been won to all the fundamentals. He does not, for instance, yet understand the superlative importance of free trade, nor is he as radical in the matter of peace and war as the editors of The Nation would have him. It has taken him long to realize, as Senator Norris now does, that to buck the system for twenty-five long years is hopeless as long as that system is entrenched in economic privileges which mere regulation and control cannot abrogate or mitigate. Were he to be elected, staggering difficulties would confront him, to say nothing of an antagonistic Congress. Being human he would make his mistakes and pay for them. But the vital point is that if he runs there will be a brave and unpurchasable man to accuse both those parties which today at bottom are nothing but robber bands bound together by the "cohesive power of public plunder"—and we shall have made a beginning toward a better America.

Not merely a beginning toward turning the rascals out. If that were all that a La Follette candidacy offered we should confess to far less interest in it than we expect to have. To substitute one group of politicians, however honest, for the dishonest would, of course, help to restore our self-respect—how could we as Americans hold up our heads before the world if the President were reelected who has connived at the trickery of Burns and Daugherty, who has lifted not one finger to undo the wrong done to Senator Wheeler, who has all but sat silent in the presence of crimes by which associates of his have profited, who is content that only one-third of the Cabinet was besmirched? Senator La Follette does not come to the front with an eye merely to this year's campaign. That would be less than half of his task. Roosevelt thrilled a large portion of the country with hopes of a new and vital and thoroughgoing party, and destroyed it when it had served his selfish purpose. To Robert La Follette we look for something far better. We shall expect him to begin a real emancipation of America, to start that revolution for which Woodrow Wilson so eloquently called, not with an eye fixed upon four years or ten, but looking forward to as distant a future as his vision may portray to him.

Railway Workers' Rights

ONE of the most important issues before Congress is the relation of the railroad unions to the carriers. This was ostensibly settled by the Esch-Cummins Act of 1920, which provided for the Railroad Labor Board and a system of local adjustment boards. The railways generally opposed the plan; the unions acquiesced without enthusiasm. Experience has converted the railroads to the idea and turned the unions sharply against it.

Previous to 1920 the railroads and the brotherhoods had built up through agreements and established practice a substantial industrial code. There were conferences between workers and management, there were bipartisan boards of adjustment, there was mediation by government officials, and there was use of voluntary arbitration. Strikes had become almost non-existent. What by many is regarded as the only true open shop existed: a practice whereby employees could be either non-union or union but under which the brotherhoods were recognized and were allowed to bargain collectively for their members.

The Transportation Act of 1920 cut right across this procedure. Ostensibly it set up local adjustment boards, and had these been organized the plan might not have worked so badly. Actually only two adjustment boards were established. The Pennsylvania Railroad killed the idea by fixing the election so as to prevent union control and insuring domination by men under its own thumb. Thus the Railroad Board became supreme, with a tendency toward standardization and what the unions believe to be a bias against them. That bias is perhaps less evident in its decisions than in its attitude when these decisions—which are not legally enforceable—are not carried out. Only formal protest has been made against violations by the carriers, but in the case of the men the Railroad Labor Board—aided by the press—has pilloried the unions as law-breakers, mobilizing public sentiment against them.

Railroad employees have come to believe not only that the board has failed but that under the most favorable circumstances it could not possibly succeed. It represents a compromise between compulsion and persuasion. Organized as a court, the board, with true legalistic instinct, not only incurs all the expenses but involves its proceedings in all the delays common to judicial bodies. Without the substance of power, but surrounded with the forms of it, the Railroad Labor Board has attempted both to mediate and to arbitrate; and, of course, it no sooner begins deciding disputes than it loses its status as a mediator. Even if the board were really a court, it would be unable to function, because it has, from the first, been submerged beneath its accumulating calendars. A recent tabulation shows that four union organizations have 845 undecided cases pending. These cases have been on the calendar from three months to three years. Most of the 1,035 cases decided were likewise pending from three months to three years.

The railroad unions are now advocating reorganization through the Howell-Barkley bill. Under its provisions the workers' unions and brotherhoods, if they are in a majority on any particular line, would be able to meet their employers directly through adjustment boards, the members of which would represent the workers' viewpoint. The workers would be able to stand for the principle of collective bargaining as against the principle of individual contract and individual relation regulated through quasi-judicial processes. What the brotherhoods are striving for is a form of organization that will permit representatives of the unions to confer with representatives of the carriers directly for the purpose of adjusting local grievances in the area in which they originate. The line of procedure involves local conferences, adjustment boards, mediation, and conciliation—if all of these fail, the voluntary submission of the issue to arbitration. In stating their case the brotherhoods say:

Let it not be thought that the bill proposes to force railroad management against their will to experiment with a novel machinery to settle labor disputes. This bill simply presents an industrial code for the railroads made up from the written and unwritten laws that have governed industrial relations on the railroads for many years. The basis of these relations lies in agreements arrived at through collective bargaining. There is not a railroad in the United States that is operating without such agreements today and not one which could function effectively for a month in the absence of such agreements.

Thus the issue is plainly revealed. The Railroad Labor Board, as it has been established, represents a direct attack upon the principle of collective bargaining. The board established the individual and the company union as the unit in all controversies between railroads and their employees. The Howell-Barkley bill would set up machinery suited to the needs of those who are willing to subscribe to the collective bargaining principle. The organized railroad workers believe that their unions must either strangle the Railroad Labor Board or be strangled by it.

Ile St. Louis

THE Ile St. Louis, so the cheerful Paris correspondents report, is to secede from the Ville Lumière. Following the illustrious example of Montmartre, its artists have proclaimed it a free republic. American immigration is to be restricted, and a series of fetes, "medical, artistic, and insurrectional," is to restore the little island to its ancient glory.

We deplore the thought. There is nothing lovelier in all Paris than the quiet quays of the Ile St. Louis. If American tourists have discovered its once peaceful restaurants their invasion is to be resented. But the horrid tide of transatlantic Nordics will not be stemmed by loud proclamations of a free republic. The citizens of the country which is proud of spending more dollars in advertising tooth-paste than France spends in advertising all her products, including truffles and Hospice de Beaune, will not be repelled by the indignant proclamations of a few Ludovicians. What has happened to Montmartre? Its cafes are packed with Americans; its bands play American jazz; its cafe-keepers have yielded to American color prejudices; and one restaurant, almost on the summit of the butte, flaunts a signboard which proclaims that "Julian Street says: 'If you have not visited the Cuckoo you have not seen Paris.'" The "Free Republic of Montmartre" is almost as completely and disgustingly an American colony as the Republic of Haiti, where the marines rule.

One of the leaders of the new Free Republic of the Ile St. Louis objects to its present incorporation in the Fourth Arrondissement of Paris, a section "notorious for its bourgeois commercialism," to which the island was arbitrarily attached:

without due consideration having been given to its geographical situation as an island entirely surrounded by the Seine, or to its political position as a residence of artists, poets, and medical students, or to its ethnology and history as the original home of the Lutetians who resisted Caesar—a people to whom Parisians are alien in spirit and in fact, being but recent immigrants from the provinces.

The neighboring island of the Cité might dispute the Ile St. Louis's claim to superior antiquity, but certainly the lesser island has preserved an integrity and charm which the rest of Paris has lost. There are, of course, simple old houses near the Street of the Cat which Fishes, opposite the Cité, where the flicker of a wood-fire will light up plaques bearing fifteenth-century dates; beaming restaurants in the rue de la Huchette will take a favored patron into cellars which are as old as Notre Dame; St. Julien-le-pauvre is five centuries more ancient than St. Louis-en-l'Ile, but both that oldest quarter of Paris and the historic Cité are disfigured by ugly modern structures, such desecrations as the prefecture de police. Ile St. Louis, with its hidden rue St. Louis cluttered with tiny shops of the purest Parisian odors, and its broad quays, faced by fine seventeenth-century houses that look today almost exactly as they did three centuries ago when, almost simultaneously with the settling of New Amsterdam, its gardens and meadows were transformed into a city—Ile St. Louis, which Voltaire, George Sand, Gautier, and Baudelaire would rejoice to find untouched by modern industrialism and brick architecture, is still old Paris—unless the American immigration has ruined it.

There are—or were very recently—rooms on the sixth floor of houses on the quai d'Anjou which could be had for five francs a day or less—rooms from whose mansard windows one looks out, in spring, across the tops of the cottonwood trees that line the Seine, and across the chimney-potted roofs of that Fourth Arrondissement which the artists deplore, to the white dome of Sacré Coeur, a sort of fairy castle set against the soft sky of France. Those rooms have cold stone floors, and one must carry one's water from below—a thing which few Americans care to do—but to live in them is to feel oneself a part of Paris.

Nor is it only the stones and mortar of the Ile St. Louis which revive old Paris. There is—or was, until recently—a simplicity and hospitality in its cafes and restaurants, more gracious than the commercial welcome of the newer or more famous sections of Paris. There is a "rendez-vous des mariniers" on one of its quays where a lame blue jay used to greet each guest, and where, after three or four visits, one became a part of the household. The only Americans in those days were indigent artists whose socks Madame used to darn, and a young couple who would bring their baby with them in a market-basket, and put it to sleep on Madame's bed, off the kitchen, while they ate.

Today the report is that 10 per cent of the island's inhabitants are Americans, who raise prices and monopolize the best corners in the restaurants. But a still horrid thought sneaks into one's mind as one reads the trumpetings of the newspaper published by the Free Republicans of the Ile St. Louis. Can it be that their loud denunciations of Americans prove only that they, too, have learned the value of advertising, and that what they are really seeking is not more peace and seclusion, but more and ever more Americans, and proportionately higher prices for the shopkeepers of the Ile?

Victor Herbert

THE career of the late Victor Herbert is little short of astounding if only on account of the sheer amount accomplished. Between the year 1894, when Mr. Herbert was thirty-five, and the year 1917, when he was fifty-eight, there is the prodigious record of forty operetta or musical-comedy scores. In the meantime, Mr. Herbert was frequently busy as orchestral conductor or as bandmaster, and even as a virtuoso of the cello, besides venturing twice from his more familiar paths to compose operas of the kind known popularly as "grand"—"Natoma," produced with a memorable cast, headed by Mary Garden and John McCormack, in Philadelphia, in 1911, and the one-act "Madeleine," done two years later, at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, with Frances Alda in the title part. This crowded section of a career takes no account of activities previous to 1894, or of his recent work for the photo-drama and in jazz.

Unremitting diligence is essential to such an achievement, but diligence can account for it only in part. There was also an extraordinary native gift of spontaneous and fluent invention and an almost uncanny ease of workmanship. Mr. Herbert, it is true, had the soundest of schooling. Irish by birth (a grandson of Samuel Lover, the novelist), he was sent to Germany to study music at the age of seven and there received thorough training first in the cello and then in composition and in conducting. His facility in so many branches of music rested, therefore, on a solid scholastic foundation. But fertility and fluency remain the most conspicuous features of his talent.

Mr. Herbert's chief fame as a composer rests on his light opera and musical comedy scores. In saying this, one does not underrate his instrumental compositions, or his uneven, fragmentary, but in certain pages admirable "Natoma"; one merely states a fact that probably no one would seriously dispute. Why, then, does Mr. Herbert as a composer of operetta rank not only below Arthur Sullivan, Offenbach, and Johann Strauss, but below some of the lesser of the Parisians and Viennese? Sullivan and Offenbach have pages only a little lower than Mozart, and the position of the greatest of the Vienna Strauss clan is, even for that fostering city of the waltz, sui generis. But Mr. Herbert would be oftener at the summit of his own ample talent were it not for an unmistakable leniency toward results. A part of his enormous facility was his contentment with the easy victory.

It is not at all a case of laziness—Mr. Herbert was industrious to a fault. Rather, he stood by whatever he put down on paper because it was he who put it down. And this element of autocracy in his attitude extended to the librettos that he set. Sullivan had the inestimable advantage of collaborating with a Gilbert. Though Offenbach and Johann Strauss were less fortunate, they and the other Parisians and Viennese were in general far better served by their playwrights than Mr. Herbert by his. Outside of the work of Alfred Bunn, who furnished the unmatched words of "The Bohemian Girl," one would search long for a peer in ineptitude to the text of "Natoma." It is because of this failure to apply rigorously the acid test of taste that Victor Herbert, for all his talent, schooling, and industry, leaves behind him nothing approaching a "Mikado," a "Grande Duchesse," a "Fledermaus" to perpetuate his fame in an abiding masterpiece.

New Morals for Old Toward Monogamy

By CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN

PHYSIOLOGISTS tell us that in all our long ages of animal evolution we have not yet completed the physical changes incident to assuming an erect posture. Psychologists may as plainly see that in the short centuries of social evolution we have naturally failed to complete the changes incident to our growth from tribal to national and international relationships.

Since we remained savages for some 90 per cent of the period of human life on earth, it is to be expected that the long-practiced tribal morals should have modified our characters more deeply than those evolved in the recent, varied, and fluctuating relationship of larger range. Yet we see, during the short period of progressive civilization, such swift and amazing development in some lines, such achievement in knowledge, in wealth, in ability, in breadth of thought, and nobility of feeling that our coincident stupidity and senseless misbehavior call for explanation.

The main reason for this peculiar delay and irregularity in social evolution is that it has been limited to half the race, the other half being restricted to domestic industry and to the still lower level of misused sex. Our specialized knowledge, power, and skill are developed through the organic relationships of the social group; as are also those characteristics of mutual loyalty and love, of truth, honor, and courage which are as natural to a human society as the distinctive virtues of ants or beavers to their groups.

Humanity's major error, the exploitation of the female by the male, has not only kept her at the lowest step in social progress—solitary hand-labor in and for the family—but has resulted in excessive sex-development through prolonged misuse. This has made her ultra-feminine, to a degree often injurious to motherhood; and him ultra-masculine, his social advance confused, impeded, and repeatedly destroyed by his excessive emotions. In social morals he has of course out-distanced her, as he alone has entered into the relationships which develop them; but he has carefully exempted his essentially male activities from this elevating influence, maintaining that "all's fair in love and war." Of her, domestic morality demanded but one virtue, sex-loyalty; her mate or master taking it upon himself to be both judge and executioner in case of failure. She might be a liar and a coward, lazy, selfish, extravagant, or cruel, but if chaste these traits were overlooked. If unchaste, no array of other virtues was enough to save her. In her household labors she developed minor virtues natural to the position; a tireless industry, an instinct for cleanliness and order, with great capacity for self-denial and petty economy. Speaking broadly, of a race where the young, though necessarily inheriting from both parents, yet are divided almost from birth in training and experience, it may be said that the social virtues have belonged to men, the domestic virtues to women.

This is the fourth article in The Nation's series on New Morals for Old; other articles to come in early issues are Modern Love and the Art of Fiction by Joseph Krutch and Dionysian Ethics by Edwin Muir.

Our present age, counting the incredible advance of the last century and the swift fruition of these immediate years, shows among its newly distinguishing social movements one of supreme importance. Within a hundred years women, in most civilized countries, have moved from domestic into social relationship. Such a sudden and enormous change, while inherently for the improvement of society, is naturally accompanied by much local and immediate dislocation in previously accepted conditions.

Many are alarmed at what is considered "the danger to the home" resultant from the refusal of an increasing number of women to spend their lives as house-servants; they fear "the menace to the family" due to similarly increasing numbers of women who refuse compulsory motherhood; they are shocked at a looseness, even grossness, of behavior between the sexes which seems to threaten marriage itself. Few seem able to look beyond the present inconveniences to a specialized efficiency in household management which will raise the standard of public health and private comfort, with large reduction in the cost of living; to such general improvement in child-culture as will lift the average of citizenship and lower the death-rate appreciably; and to a rational and permanent basis for our monogamous marriage.

To understand rightly this trying period, to be patient with its unavoidable reactions and excesses, to know what tendencies to approve and promote and what to condemn and oppose, requires some practical knowledge of biology and sociology. Men, though as yet beyond women in social morality, are unreliable judges in this time of change because their ox is gored—they are the ones who are losing a cherished possession. The overdeveloped sex instinct of men, requiring more than women were willing to give, has previously backed its demands by an imposing array of civil and religious laws requiring feminine submission, has not scrupled to use force or falsehood, and held final power through the economic dependence of women. It is easy to see that if women had been equally willing no such tremendous machinery of compulsion need have been evolved.

But now that the woman no longer admits that "he shall rule over her," and is able to modify the laws; now that she has become braver, and above all is attaining financial freedom, her previous master has no hold upon her beyond natural attraction and—persuasion. Toward this end he manifests an instant and vigorous activity. Whereas in the past women were taught that they had no such "imperative instincts" as men, and the wooer, even the husband, sought to preserve this impression, now it is quite otherwise. All that elaborate theory of feminine chastity, that worship of virginity, goes by the board, and women are given a reversed theory—that they are just the same as men, if not more so; our "double standard" is undoubled and ironed flat—to the level of masculine desire.

Clothed in the solemn, newly invented terms of psychoanalysis, a theory of sex is urged upon us which bases all our activities upon this one function. It is exalted as not only an imperative instinct, but as the imperative instinct, no others being recognized save the demands of the stomach. Surely never was a more physical theory disguised in the technical verbiage of "psychology." We should not too harshly blame the ingenious mind of man for thinking up a new theory to retain what the old ones no longer assured him; nor too severely criticize the subject class, so newly freed, for committing the same excesses, the same eager imitations of the previous master, which history shows in any recently enfranchised people. Just as women have imitated the drug-habits of men, without the faintest excuse or reason, merely to show that they can, so are they imitating men's sex habits, in large measure. Those who go too far in such excesses will presumably die without issue, doing no permanent harm to the stock. This wild excitement over sex, as if it were a new discovery peculiar to our time, will be allayed by further knowledge. Even a little study of the common facts of nature has a cooling and heartening influence.

The essential facts are these: That all living forms show the tendency to maintain and to reproduce themselves; that some, in differing degree, show tendencies to vary and to improve; that after an immense period of reproduction without it (showing that as the "life force" it was quite unnecessary) the distinction of sex appeared as a means to freer variation and improvement; that the male characteristics of intense desire for the female, personal display, and intermasculine combat, as well as the female's instinct of selection, are visible contributions to the major purpose of improvement; that in the higher and later life-forms further and more rapid improvement has been made through the development in the female of new organs and functions for the benefit of the young; through her alone have come the upward steps of viviparous birth, the marsupial pouch, and that crowning advantage, the mammary glands; the female solely is responsible for the development of nature's aristocracy, Order Mammalia.

In the human species she adds to her previous contributions to racial progress the invention of our primitive industries, which were evolved by her in service to the young, and later carried out by men into the trades and crafts which support human life. In the developing care and nurture of her children she laid the foundation for those social functions of government, education, and cooperative industry which are so vitally important to social progress that we have called the family "the unit of the state."

This is an error. The family is the prototype of the state, a tiny primitive state in itself, often quite inimical to the interests of the larger state which has developed through the wider interaction of individuals. The state does not elect families, tax families, punish families, nor thrive where physical inheritance is made the basis of authority. Where the family persists too powerfully, as in China, there is a commensurate lack in the vitality and efficiency of the state. By restricting women to the family relationship, with its compulsory woman service and domestic morality, we have checked and perverted social growth by keeping out of it the most effective factor in that growth, the mother.

The world having been for so long dominated by the individualistic and combative male, with that vast increment of masculine thought and emotion embodied in our literature, our religion, our art, modifying all our ideals, it is not to be wondered at that the newly freed women are as yet unable to see their opportunity, their power, and their long-prevented sex duty—race improvement.

The collapse of the arbitrary and unjust domestic morality of the past will presently be followed by recognition of the social morality of the future. Rightly discarding artificial standards of virtue based on the pleasure of men, we shall establish new ones based on natural law. Repudiating their duty to an owner and master, women have yet to accept and fulfil their duty to society, to the human race. This is not generally clear to them. In their legitimate rebellion against domestic service and compulsory sex-service they almost inevitably confuse these things with marriage, with which indeed they have been long synonymous. Some of our most valuable women, as well as many of negligible importance, speak of marriage as if it were an invention of Queen Victoria. Surely no excessive education is needed to learn that monogamy, among many of the higher carnivora and birds, is as natural a form of sex union as the polygamy of the grass eaters or the promiscuity among insects, reptiles, and fish. Monogamy appears when it is to the advantage of the young to have the continued care of both parents. This means that the parents share in the activities of supporting the family; it does not mean that the female becomes the servant of the male. Because of the united activities and mutual services of the pair love is developed, and stays. Such profound affection is found in some of these natural "marriages" that if one of a pair is killed the other will not mate again. Mated leopards or ostriches do not remain together because they are "Victorian" or "puritanical," but because they like to. They could form as many and as variegated "free unions" as Greenwich Villagers if they chose; there is nothing to stop them.

But natural monogamy is as free from sex service as from domestic service. The pairing species adhere to their mating season as do the polygamous ones, or even the promiscuous. Man is the only animal using this function out of season and apart from its essential purpose. These natural monogamists are not "ascetics." They are not dominated by religious doctrine or civil law. They fulfil their natural desires with the utmost freedom, but these desires do not move them out of season.

The human species, with all its immense advantages, has made many conspicuous missteps. Its eating habits are such as to have induced a wide assortment of wholly unnecessary diseases; its drinking habits are glaringly injurious; and its excessive indulgence in sex-waste has imperiled the life of the race.

Domestic morality vaguely recognized some duty to society and sought through religion to limit masculine desires or at least to restrict their indulgence to marriage. But the desires of a vigorous polygamist are not easily restricted to one wife; and our polygamous period was far longer than that of the recently established monogamy. It is a most reassuring fact in social evolution that monogamy, naturally belonging to our species, has persisted among the common people and in popular ideals: even in "The Arabian Nights" the love story is always about one man and one woman, never of the mad passion for a harem! So with the accelerated progress of recent centuries monogamous union becomes accepted, and is carefully buttressed by the law, while religion, with commandments and ceremonies, does its best to establish "the sanctity of marriage."

But as religion, law, and family authority were all in the hands of men, they naturally interpreted that sanctity to suit themselves, ignored the religious restrictions, and so handled the law as to apply its penalties to but one party in a dual offense.

Social morality requires the promotion of such lines of conduct as are beneficial to the maintenance and improvement of society. It will demand of both man and woman the full development of personal health and vigor, careful selection of the best mate by both, with recognition on her side of special responsibility as the natural arbiter. It will encourage such sex relations as are proved advantageous both to individual happiness and to the race. We are as yet so hag-ridden by domestic morality, with its arbitrary restrictions, and by the threats and punishments of law and religion, that we shrink from the broader biological judgment as if it involved blame, punishment, compulsory reform. Not at all. Men and women are no more to blame for being oversexed than a prize hog for being overfat. The portly pig is not sick or wicked, he is merely overdeveloped in adipose tissue. Our condition does not call for condemnation, nor can we expect any sudden and violent change in our behavior resting on foolish ideals of celibacy, of self-denial, or of "sublimated sex." It will take several generations of progressive selection, with widely different cultural influences, to reestablish a normal sex development in genus homo, with its consequences in happier marriage, better children, and wide improvement in the public health.

It is to this end, with all its widening range of racial progress, that social morality tends.

After the French Elections

By IDA TREAT

Paris, May 14

THE French elections proved that Poincaré's oft-repeated assertion that "all France is behind us" represented a hope rather than a fact. The events of the last year had seriously undermined the popularity of a military foreign policy in a country still war-worn and eager for peace. "All France" was beginning to long for a pacific solution of its problems both abroad and at home. For months popular confidence in Poincaré's supposedly firm policy had been weakening because of his own hesitations and indecisions.

The April readjustment of the Poincaré Ministry was generally interpreted as an admission of weakness. The much-heralded stabilization of the franc had shown itself purely artificial, as the cost of living remained almost unchanged, though the franc had risen in value in terms of the dollar. The Government's attempt to meet the budget of expenses charged to the reparation account by railroading a 20 per cent tax increase through the Chamber aroused great antagonism among all classes of French citizens, already burdened with the indirect taxes, which constitute seven-tenths of the nation's tax resources. It was also interpreted as an open avowal of the failure of the French reparations policy, as a substitution of "France will pay" for the eternal "Germany will pay" so loudly proclaimed when Poincaré sent the first troops into the Ruhr.

What further increased the unpopularity of the Government was its insistence on the decree-laws, which were violently attacked by the Left as a return to the ordonnances of Charles X or the senatus-consulte of the First Empire—a direct violation of republican legality. The hearty support given the decree-laws by the Royalists and Bonapartists in the Chamber—by Léon Daudet and Prince Joachim Murat—helped to increase the ardor of the opposition. In addition there were a whole series of economic factors: the scandalous profits realized by French exporters when the franc dropped; the increased cost of living—40 per cent higher today than in January, 1923; the failure of the government employees to obtain the expected indemnity for the high cost of living; the uncompromising policy of the steel trust, and the failure of a series of great strikes—the textile workers at Roanne, the metal workers at St.

Etienne, the factory workers of Citroen and Panhard-Levassor at Paris; and finally the continued decrease in the value of the government rentes—3 per cent bonds issued before the war at 95 francs, gold, are today worth 53 francs, paper, or 6.75 francs, gold, and 5 per cent bonds of the year 1916 issued at 90 francs, gold, are listed today at 69 francs, paper.

Since 1919 Socialists and Communists have been waging an active campaign against the Bloc National, denouncing its policies at thousands of meetings held throughout France. While their campaign against "Poincaré-la-Guerre" did not obtain the success hoped for, it revived the question of responsibility for the war at a time when nine-tenths of the country still thought that question had been settled by the Treaty of Versailles.

Poincaré's policy of repression in 1923-24—the repeated dismissal of state employees, the attempt to base political conspiracy charges on forged documents emanating from the Ministry of War, the revelations concerning the role played by the Union of Economic Interests, particularly by M. Billiet, its president, in the 1919 elections, the scandal of the devastated districts with more than 20 billions of francs paid out on imaginary damage claims—all furnished the opposition with excellent grounds for an electoral campaign.

In the 1919 elections the Socialists refused to join forces with the Radicals, much to the annoyance of the left fraction of the latter, who thereupon united with the reactionary Right, as the French voting system results in a disproportionately large number of successful candidates where there is a coalition and is prejudicial to single parties. The Radical platform hardly differed from that of the reactionaries—enforcement of the Versailles Treaty, "Germany will pay," opposition to bolshevism, and—in many cases—the reform of the eight-hour day. Reactionaries and Radicals joined in the Bloc National that ever since 1919 has had a majority of 200 in the Chamber of Deputies.

Tardieu

¹ Only war profits were exempt from this 20 per cent tax increase; and the tax on war profits had in four years yielded only 11 of the estimated 17 billions.

When it became evident that owing to the growing unpopularity of the Poincaré Government the Bloc National could not hope to repeat the victory of 1919, the Radical Party had a sudden resurrection. Its left wing, to which Herriot soon rallied, took the lead and began urging the Socialists to join it in a Left Bloc that would last "only a minute"—the time to get elected—and in which neither party would abandon its true program. This the Socialists were nothing loath to do, for the Communist Party, organized after the split at Tours, had absorbed the majority of its former members. The Bloc was formed; in many departments of France Radicals and Socialists presented a joint list of candidates.

The platform of the Left Bloc—for the two parties agreed on a minimum electoral program—laid more weight on internal than on foreign policy. As for the question of the Ruhr, Herriot (Radical), Boncour, and Varenne (Socialist) stated that if they came into power they would not withdraw the troops of occupation "without guaranties." The Bloc accepted in principle the Dawes Report as a basis for international agreement. But the campaign was chiefly directed toward the defense of the French democracy, and against new taxes and the increased cost of living.

From the first days of the campaign it was clear that the dictatorship of the Bloc National was doomed. In the elections it lost 187 deputies. Apparently 212 members of the New Chamber are still Bloc National; 46 belong to the Briand group; 294, Radicals and Socialists, to the Left Bloc; and 26 are Communists.

Many of the prominent figures of the former Chamber were defeated. The Royalists lost their leader, Léon Daudet; the Bonapartists, Joachim Murat. The former ministers Lasteyrie, Maunoury, André Lefèvre, were not re-elected, nor were those two representatives of Clemenceau's old guard—Mandel and Tardieu. Jean Longuet was badly beaten, and the Radicals lost one of their most outstanding figures—the venerable Ferdinand Buisson—as well as that staunch republican and pacifist, Marc Sangnier.

The Communists presented lists of candidates in every department in France, held innumerable meetings—200 within ten days in Paris alone—obtained 900,000 votes, and elected twenty-six deputies. Their relatively small success in the provinces—fifteen deputies are from Paris and the Seine—is due to two causes: In their effort to present only candidats de classe, workers and peasants, they were led to name many candidates totally unknown to the voters at large—a tactical error in a country that still adores the tribun and prefers, on the whole, to vote for a man rather than an idea. Then too they suffered from the French voting system, always favorable to coalitions. More than one vote was lost the Communists because the elector, whose chief object was to defeat the Bloc National, hesitated to risk the chance of throwing away his vote. Better a Left Bloc than a Bloc National! Throughout the south of France the Communists were blamed for not joining forces with the Bloc. As it is they have doubled their number in the Chamber, and count among their twenty-six deputies a political prisoner, Jacques Doriot, sentenced to ten months' imprisonment for anti-militaristic propaganda, together with the leader of the Black Sea mutineers, André Marty, elected in the same department as Colrat, the former Minister of Justice who kept Marty four years in prison. The Communists count their success in the suburbs of Paris—where their list, with Vaillant-Couturier at its head, received more votes than any other—as a strategic victory.

Assured of a majority in the Chamber, the Left Bloc is now preoccupied with the make-up of the new Government. June 1 is to mark the end of the Poincaré regime. The Socialists, according to repeated decisions of their party congresses, cannot collaborate in a "bourgeois" ministry. Certain of their leaders—such as Léon Blum—state that the party will not accept a single ministerial portfolio; certain others—notably Paul Boncour—declare themselves ready to "share power and its responsibilities." A party congress to decide this important question has been called for June 1 and 2. The Cartel d'une minute may extend itself indefinitely. In the words of Paul Boncour, "The country has elected Radicals and Socialists together. If we declare that we cannot work together we act contrary to the wishes of the country."

If the Socialists refuse to modify their present tactics they must follow one of two courses of action—support the Radicals without participating in the Government or join the Communists in opposition from the Left. The latter course would oblige the Radicals to join forces with the left wing of the Center-Right, forming a Center Bloc Government presumably with Briand at the head.

The triumph of the Left Bloc was a negative rather than a positive victory. It signifies what the country did not want rather than what it wants. But from the standpoint of France's foreign policy, the formation of a Left Bloc Government means a stride toward the recognition of Russia and an international solution of the reparations problem. In so far as the new Government's internal policy is concerned, the future may be less clearly predicted. The legacy of the Bloc National to its successors is to be counted in liabilities rather than in assets.

The total debt of France—foreign as well as internal—has attained 430 billion francs—a figure that has been increasing yearly. A Left Bloc Government will doubtless be little more inclined to pay off its foreign debts than was its predecessor; with respect to the internal debt, nothing short of a miracle will enable the new Government to balance its budget. The high cost of living, which shows no sign of decreasing, may bring about social disorders that will sorely try the liberal policy of the Bloc; many a battle will have to be fought out in the corridors of the Chamber before the Union of Economic Interests can be brought to bay. The financial question, the question of the budget, is the gravest problem that the new Government will have to face. Whether or not that Government is formed by a coalition of Radicals and Socialists, or of Radicals and Republicans, with Briand, Herriot, Painlevé, or even Léon Blum as Premier, that problem of the budget is going to represent its acid test—if not its Waterloo.

Herriot

Painlevé

The Race Problem in the Caribbean

By ROBERT HERRICK

I. The English Way

CAREACOU is the merest dot in the Caribbean Sea, which appears only on the largest maps. It belongs, with a score of other small islands, to the "Presidency" of Grenada (which is associated with Trinidad and St. Vincent in one colonial government) in the Lesser Antilles. There are not over two thousand people in Careacou, and all but a very few are black or colored. They raise cotton and limes, chiefly, also a little sugar-cane and cacao. The only regular means of communication with the outer world is a battered sloop, with a Negro captain and crew, that plies weekly between the island and Grenada. Chance landed me on Careacou one warm day last March, and chance led me into the bare courtroom above the police station, where it seemed to me was dramatized quite simply the secret of English success in dealing with a so-called "inferior race," without riots and reprisals, without creating an ugly sore of the race problem. I am aware how distorted the comprehensions of the casual traveler are likely to be, how he smooths and foreshortens appearances, rationalizing whatever he sees to fit some preconceived formula. But I had no preconceived formulas about the race question, and so I give what I saw and felt for what it may be worth.

Dawdling along the one street of little Careacou I saw a white man ride in from the country on a well-groomed pony, dismount in the small square opposite the police station, tie his horse to a rail there, and mount the long flight of wooden steps that led to an upper story, up which for some time a stream of colored folk dressed in their best had been going. I followed the crowd. The courtroom was tightly packed with a hundred-odd black people of different shades of blackness—the litigants, their friends, and counsel. The white man sat behind the bench under a faded insignia of George IV, his crown attorney and bailiff and clerk below him, all very black men. A colored attorney was defending a prisoner who had got into a street row on Carnival Day, the previous week, and had resisted arrest. Various witnesses were heard, and he was allowed to speak in his own behalf. The judge, in the paternal British fashion of judges, took an active hand in all stages of the proceeding, questioning the prisoner and witnesses, correcting the excessive zeal of both lawyers, cutting off the Crown lawyer when he was repeating himself. The judge was evidently determined to get at the root of the matter, to resolve just how serious William Williams's infraction of the regulations had been.

It was the same way with the old woman who had omitted to take out a license for her mule, with the quarreling group that disputed the ownership of an old horse, with all the rest of the petty cases that came before him that long, hot forenoon. Sometimes he advised the litigants to settle out of court. When he wasn't sure in his own mind, he put the case over until the next session, and always he made voluminous notes in long hand.

I sat there absorbed while Careacou's dirty linen was being carefully washed out. The white judge, the sole white person beside myself in the courtroom, for that matter the sole white man I saw in the town that day, was not an especially clever person; in fact, rather dull and commonplace. But he was so fair, so honest, so determined to do "the right thing," without a trace of conscious superiority either of race or of function! And the attitude of the colored people crowded into the stuffy courtroom reflected this attitude of the white judge. They were orderly, serious, quiet (as quiet as any gathering of Negroes ever can be). It was apparent that they knew justice would be done, not only between themselves and the law, but between themselves and members of the "superior race."

Court adjourned for three weeks. The faded little white man in the correct English gentleman's riding costume gave some instructions to his Negro clerk, walked out of the courtroom, mounted his horse, and rode off.

This, I knew, was not an idyllic and isolated case. Something very much like it was taking place throughout the thousand-mile reach of British islands in the Caribbean. Sometimes with a colored magistrate behind the bench, for already the English are appointing colored judges just as they have for a long time admitted colored people to the civil services (until today the great majority even of the more responsible posts are filled by them). Of course the police, including their officers, are black, and the court officials. That has not always been so, but two generations ago a wise English governor of one of the colonies pronounced the self-evident truth that as these tropical lands must inevitably some day belong to the black people, they being already by numbers and by adaptation to their environment dominant, it was advisable to admit members of the "inferior race" to all possible government posts.

It was a light-colored custom-house inspector who came out to the schooner when it dropped anchor exactly at sundown in the harbor of Kingstown, St. Vincent, and with a courtesy and businesslike efficiency that might well be copied by our New York customs' inspectors, cut the red tape, expedited us ashore with our luggage, and personally concerned himself in finding an abiding-place in the crowded town. He was a gentleman—not only in speech and manners, but in his intelligence and lack of official boorishness. So with the dark doctor who came off at Castries and let me ashore two hours before the regulations permitted, and his colored colleagues in the custom house, who explained patiently and politely the numerous infractions of the laws of which I had been innocently guilty on my arrival. The colored head of the agricultural department of Grenada was a fellow traveler on the mail packet from St. George's to Careacou, he and his microscope, for he was engaged in investigating the boll weevil. He was not only an educated man and an intelligent official, but also a kindly person with an instinctive courtesy toward an ignorant stranger that one might look far for in an American official of similar rank. In my wanderings through these islands, with haphazard contacts from Barbados to Trinidad, to St. Kitts and Antigua, I met with nothing but courtesy and intelligence among these officials of the "inferior race": and as for the police—if one was in search of a meal or a clean bed or cultural information, one turned to the police station, and invariably found there an obliging black corporal or sergeant, who interested himself immediately in providing what one was looking for with a politeness and a command of good English that might put to shame New York's finest.

The contrast in all this between a section of our own "black belt," whether in Alabama and Mississippi or in St. Louis and Chicago, and any of these English colonies must astonish the American traveler. What has brought about this decent atmosphere of tolerance and mutual respect between the races? Doubtless many intricate causes, but preeminently the English habit of justice and the experiment of letting the colored people share in their own government so largely. And I never heard in the mouth of a colonial white, no matter how irritated he might be over labor conditions, such brutal and stupid opinions about the "inferior race" as are only too common among the Americans who visit the West Indies.

I had two stock questions that I put to the white officials I met, among others, to the chief medical officer of one colony, the attorney general of another: "How many crimes of violence have occurred in your jurisdiction in the last two years?" Sometimes they had to go back four and five years to find a case of first-class assault or murder. The attorney general recalled one atrocious case that he had prosecuted in three years. Compare that with Chicago or New York, or for that matter any rural district of a similar density of population, either North or South, in the United States!

My other question was: "Can a white woman of the upper class go safely anywhere at any time of day or night in your island unescorted?" The answer to this was a stare of surprise. "Of course! Why not?" When one realizes that the country districts in these islands because of their lofty mountains and poor roads are often much more remote from the centers than the distance in miles would indicate, it seems to an American unbelievable that "the usual crime" is practically unknown in these colonies. Better evidence perhaps than hearsay is the fact that white women live on country plantations, at times alone except for black servants. I recall what a Northern white man living in Williamsburgh, Virginia, once told me in all seriousness, that no "respectable" white woman ever dared to walk outside the narrow confines of the town, unaccompanied. What has taught the colonial black to be so much less bestial than his American cousin? Or is he? Is the "usual crime" a form of perverted imagination or an excuse for race tyranny?

In the English way both races are compelled to observe the laws—even the traffic regulations—in these far-away dots of tropical land, as no American ever obeys anything if he can help himself. The motor-car in which I was riding, going at a footpace through a crowded village, happened to knock the tray off a colored woman's head, spilling her load of vegetables. It was not the driver's fault: the woman was staring over her shoulder in the opposite direction—and we might easily have got away. But a raised white-gloved hand from the black policeman beside the road caused the chauffeur to stop immediately, and a thorough investigation of the accident was held then and there. The roads do not belong exclusively to the motorists in Trinidad or in any other British colony.

The English respect for the fundamental decencies of life has been firmly implanted in the Negro consciousness, in some instances oddly so. In spite of the tropic heat and the inviting coolness of the most superb bathing to be had in the world, at almost any point of the shore, one never sees anybody over ten taking a plunge naked. One warm afternoon when I had landed on a lonely little beach, entirely surrounded with cocoanut palms and thick undergrowth, without a dwelling of any sort in sight, I was preparing for an impromptu swim when a warning voice descended on me from some thatched ajoupa concealed by the palms: "You can't do that here! You can't bathe without a suit!" (This not forty miles from the island of Tobago, which was Defoe's model for "Robinson Crusoe," and a good many miles from the white man and his superior notions.) Abashed by this firm correction, I resumed my underclothes and was permitted to bathe unmolested.

There remains, of course, the important field of social contacts between the races, about which the traveler can form few reliable impressions. The English colonial in the Antilles will tell you that "the best white people" have no social contacts with the black or any of his colored variations. They tell you woeful instances of white English girls who have married men of color at home and have been brought to the colonies only to suffer complete exclusion from white society. Of course, they admit, the white men will live with black women—that can't be helped! But in their homes, at their clubs, there are no contacts whatever between the races. Considering the large number of highly intelligent and educated colored clerks working side by side with white men in business and government offices, one is inclined to accept this dictum with more than the usual grain of salt, which is apt to increase when one questions farther the franker and more open-minded whites. One finds that there are "rare" exceptions, in the tolerant British fashion, and many gradations of social exclusion depending on the individual case. "If we've known all about his people for a long time," or "if he is the right sort," we "forget a little color." Then there are the gradations of official society, or "Government House," where colored officials with their families may be received at "the more formal functions." In brief, the dwindling minority of pure white colonials do their honest best to preserve the purity of their race (as they have an undoubted right to do), except by abstaining from intercourse with black women. I suppose for the most part their small clubs are practically without members of "color." But it is not racially a matter of great importance whether these tiny groups exclude all "color" from their circles or not. The hotels, the few trains, the steamships, the government offices—all but the few high administrative posts filled from the Colonial Office at home—are all open on terms of equality to both races.

To all intents and purposes, then, this is a black country officered and administered by colored people, largely for themselves. The whites are giving up the struggle and abandoning the islands. They grumble about the labor, the economic conditions; which comes down practically to this, that profitable exploitation by white men is dependent upon an ample supply of very cheap labor. The more the colored man rises in the economic and social scale the less profit can the white planter make off him. And the white man cannot stand the climate, in the long run, as the colored man can. The result is inevitable. It is to the credit of the English colonial that the white man accepts the inevitable in the only way that could prevent a nasty race problem, such as we have on our hands, increasingly.

Premonitions

by A r t
Y
o u n
g

LET THE CHIPS FALL WHERE THEY LISTEN

Art Young Gets Busy

The Republican Party
Down to Date

Choosing the Jockey

Main Street
Points With Pride

It's a Long Time Between Meals

Nogin—Industrialist and Revolutionist

By CLINTON W. GILBERT

WHEN Victor P. Nogin, head of the Russian Textile Syndicate, was in this country a few months ago arranging for the purchase of cotton to supply the Soviet mills, the American bankers with whom he was negotiating for credit fell to asking him questions about the great riddle of Russia.

"How do people live in Russia?"

Nogin replied: "We all work and receive wages."

"But can a man make any money in Russia?"

"Take myself, for example," replied Nogin, "my salary as head of this Textile Syndicate is 15 chervontsi a month ($75). Of course the Government furnishes me with living quarters. I have some other jobs for which I receive pay, but I give all my salary, outside the 15 chervontsi a month, to the Communist Party."

His syndicate has spent $15,000,000 for cotton in this country within the last few months.

"Have you a family?"

Nogin took out of his pocket a photograph of his wife and two children and showed it.

"But don't you feel that you have to accumulate money for your family? Suppose anything should happen to you, who would take care of your children?"

"My wife has a job as good as I have and she could take care of the children."

"But if she should die, too?"

"I have given all my life to the revolution. The government would take care of the children."

Then he added quietly after a moment:

"If when I came to die I had given my life to making money I should not feel very well satisfied with myself."

A few days ago the cable brought the news that he was dead, as the result of an operation which he was about to undergo when I saw him recently in Moscow. Through his death the Russian revolution lost one of its solidest figures, of a type of which it has so far produced few, men with a faith in communism and the capacity for industrial organization which, it seemed to me, would go far in any part of the world. The weakest side of the Soviet movement is its handling of industry. A revolutionary movement may develop brilliant propagandists, able politicians, unusual military leaders, even statesmen, but there is nothing in its training to develop managers of industry. And it is by its ability to produce cheaply and to distribute widely and fairly the products of industry that in the long run Soviet society will be judged.

Nogin's coming to this country to organize the purchase of his cotton supply here was an act of courage and imagination. He had to be prepared to face a natural communistic prejudice against having an American corporation represent a Russian state enterprise in this country. By no twisting of language could one reconcile a company organized under the laws of the State of New York with communism. A weaker man would have shrunk from facing his party on this issue. And a weaker man might have hesitated to approach American bankers seeking credit. Supposing he failed, what would be his position then in Russia? This step of his, in a smaller way, was almost as radical a departure as Lenin's inauguration of the new economic policy.

And he succeeded here as much by the personal impression he produced, by the confidence he inspired, as by being able to show that he had been buying and paying for cotton for a year in Germany. A doctrinaire revolutionist, pure and simple, would have failed to impress the American bankers even though he had brought with him books to prove that for months he had been buying and manufacturing cotton successfully. The bankers recognized Nogin as a business man even though he was one without the profit motive that was familiar to them.

To conduct a Russian state trust one has to be something more than a business organizer. One has to be a good enough politician to deal with the sentiment, the doctrinaire criticisms, of the Communist Party, which I should say would be a rather appalling board of directors to have sitting over one. Here Nogin's record as a revolutionist doubtless helped him. He was an "old Bolshevik." He had been seven times exiled by the Czarist Government, the last time to the coldest place on earth, far above the Arctic Circle in Siberia.

In such a position one has not only to impress favorably American bankers and deal effectively with the Communist Party. One has to enjoy the favor of the workers. Nogin owed his place at the head of the Textile Syndicate to his popularity with the textile workers. He had been a textile worker himself. He had learned the business of cotton manufacture in Manchester, England.

When one is head of a Russian state syndicate such as that of which Nogin was chief one does not merely produce the article which the mills nominally turn out. One keeps alive the human spirit. One conducts difficult human relations on an experimental basis. One runs a baby farm. The word "tavarish" (comrade) is not an empty word in Russia.

I visited Nogin at the building of the Textile Syndicate on the Varvarka in Moscow. The atmosphere of his office was as different from that of the office of the president of any great American manufacturing trust as one can imagine. Subordinates kept coming in to see him with little formality. His girl secretary sitting in the opposite corner of the room would not tip-toe over to his desk and wait for the great man to raise his eyes. She would call out to him informally "Victor Pavlovich" whenever she had anything to communicate.

I went about the building with him. The workmen took off their caps to him, but he took off his hat to them. The foremen everywhere shook hands with him and had something to say to him privately. At the mills I found the children of the women workers, under seven years old, taken care of in creches as clean and as well conducted as an American hospital, receiving three meals a day and medical attendance at the expense of the syndicate.

In Russia relations between men and men are not commercialized. I don't think the revolution alone accounts for the vitality of the feeling that men are brothers and not merely names on a pay roll. I think the revolution caught Russia before human relations had become commercialized. It is trying to stabilize them there.

It is much easier to conduct production with the single aim of goods and not human relations. It is much easier to conduct production under a more practicable board of directors than the Communist Party. The rest of the world has found an irreconcilable contradiction in the aims of the Russian revolution. Russia is and will remain for a long time an experiment. Nogin seemed to me extraordinarily fitted to carry on the experiment. And, as a matter of fact, the textile industry under his management had made more and greater progress than any other industrial undertaking of Russia.

That is why it seems to me he is as hard to replace in his field as Lenin was in his. Smaller men have succeeded Lenin. The human spirit, even the revolutionary spirit, easily grows tired. That is as good a ground for skepticism about Russia as any that has ever been advanced.

Third-Party Vibrations

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

AT last the political radio sets are able to get some clearer tones from the mutterings and rumblings of third-party oratory and aspiration in the progressive ether. The following things now seem certain:

The genuine La Follette personal presidential effort has its headquarters in Chicago in the Auditorium Hotel, where a "La Follette for President Committee" has established an office under the management of a group of people including significantly W. T. Rawleigh, Dante M. Pierce, Donald Richberg, and James H. McGill.

Mr. Rawleigh is a wealthy manufacturer of Freeport, Illinois, who is intimately associated with the general La Follette movement and who took a leading part in promoting the recent senatorial candidacy of Newton Jenkins on a La Follette platform against Medill McCormick and Charles S. Deneen. This candidacy by Jenkins, who was relatively unknown, accumulated more than a hundred thousand votes in Illinois. It was supported by forays of leading La Follette captains from Wisconsin into Illinois territory. It represented a genuine official strategic move by the La Follette forces. Rawleigh was a leading figure in it. He can safely be regarded as among those La Follette enthusiasts who act not simply out of an inward impulse to volunteer their services to La Follette but out of an exact knowledge of the actual immediate intentions of the La Follette organization.

The same remark can equally safely be made about Dante M. Pierce. He is intimately within the La Follette organization. His powerful farm publication, the Iowa Homestead, issued from Des Moines, was primarily responsible for the putting of Brookhart into the United States Senate. Pierce introduced La Folletteism into Iowa. That is, he gave it there its first State-wide conquest. He is known to be always fully informed about what is happening and what is intended at Madison, Wisconsin. It would be strange, indeed, if he were acting now without secure knowledge that his action would not be inconsistent with La Follette's own personal wishes.

It is thus to be perceived that the predictions made in these letters from Washington begin to be verified. La Follette's candidacy is not growing out of a convention. It is not growing out of any new party. It is springing from a committee of his own personal friends. It is an individual performance—by La Follette—and is directed toward just one office—the Presidency.

Further, the platform is simply La Follette himself. On the stationery of the "La Follette for President Committee" there appear just two platform planks. The first is: "The will of the people shall be the law of the land." The second is: "The supreme issue is the encroachment of the powerful few upon the rights of the many." These planks certainly do not commit La Follette to anything in the future. The platform of the La Follette presidential candidacy is simply La Follette himself and his past record.

Further corroboration is given to this view by La Follette's repudiation of the outright third-party convention at St. Paul on June 17. The Communist camels who insisted on poking their noses into that tent were of enormous strategic value to La Follette. They gave him two opportunities.

In the first place they made it convenient and opportune for him to disassociate himself from all European bolshevistic ideas without seeming to go artificially out of his way to do it. In the second place—and even more importantly—they gave him the means by which he was able to disassociate himself from a convention which in any case, even if the Communists had not been invited to it, might have proved embarrassing to him.

There was no telling—in any case—what sort of speeches might have been made at that convention. There was no telling what sort of policies might have been put into its platform in addition to the policies laid down in the call for it. The Northwest is full of legislative ideas to which La Follette has never personally subscribed.

Now, thanks to the Communists, he has thrown that possible load off his shoulders for a reason which will commend itself to multitudes of propertied farmers and of vehemently anti-red trade unionists.

It is then to be noted that the Chicago "La Follette for President Committee" contains in its list of directors the special legislative attorney of the railroad trade unions. Donald Richberg has represented the railroad trade unions in many matters and he is now representing them in Washington in the matter of their Howell-Barkley bill for reorganizing the relations between labor and capital on railroads.

It is on the failure of Congress to legislate for the railroad trade unionists and on the failure of Congress to legislate for the farmers that the La Follette candidacy will especially rely for votes in large masses this fall.

Carl Vrooman, who used to be Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under Woodrow Wilson and who is a good Democrat but who owns quite a few farms in Illinois, has publicly said in Washington that unless the Democrats this year put up a man for President who seems likely to have the will and skill to help the farmers, why, the farmers, including himself, will start looking for a presidential candidate outside the ranks of both old parties.

Attention accordingly gets shifted to the convention of the Conference for Progressive Political Action to be held at Cleveland on July 4. At this convention Mr. Richberg's clients, the railroad trade unions, will be the principal hosts, and no Communists will be either hosts or guests. This convention will be only tentatively and potentially and futuristically a third-party convention. It will be thoroughly sympathetic with La Follette's policy of operating through the two old existing parties except in specific localities and for specific offices where and when the opportunity for doing so has ceased.

The July 4 Cleveland convention will not, it is thought, have ideas or methods embarrassing to the La Follette for President Committee in Chicago. The notes coming through the progressive ether now are not of any new heaven and new earth but of a presidential candidacy based on one given human personal record and backed primarily by the specific grievances of two given classes.

Our Navy at Work

By BENJAMIN C. MARSH

IS it an accident that the departments of State, War, and Navy are housed under one roof in our national capital?

Hoping to get some light on the subject I wrote Secretary of State Hughes two years and a half ago (to be exact, September 8, 1921) asking if he could inform me what concessions Americans had secured since the European War broke out—particularly in China and Asia Minor. Early in October Mr. Alvey A. Adee, second Assistant Secretary of State, replied, citing a long list of publications bearing on the subject, but stating:

On account of the unsettled political status of various portions of the former Turkish Empire and in view of the unadjudicated nature of various concessionary claims it would not seem possible or appropriate at this time to make any statement regarding concessions which may be claimed to have been granted, confirmed, or recognized since the armistice.

The Navy Department takes just the reverse attitude.

The office of Naval Intelligence in October, 1922, published a pamphlet of 154 pages, "The United States Navy as an Industrial Asset" with the subtitle "What the Navy Has Done for Industry and Commerce." It frankly answers the question "Should we protect our investors abroad?" with an affirmative as big as the navy. A few quotations will suffice to show this.

The navy's role as a stabilizer for our trade in unsettled regions is much less understood than that of giving physical protection. . . .

A large percentage of the Turkish tobacco used in the cigarettes made in this country is obtained in the vicinity of Samsun, and the American tobacco companies represented there depend practically entirely on the moral effect of having an American man-of-war in port to have their tobacco released for shipment.

And, without a smile breaking out from the type:

One destroyer is kept continuously at Samsun, Turkey, to look after the American tobacco interests at that port.

The Navy Department is extremely generous in correcting misinformation which exists in the minds of us ignorant landlubbers. Under date of April 16 of this year, Lieutenant W. F. Dietrich, Information Section, Navy Department, sending me copies of speeches made by naval officers, and the pamphlet quoted above, wrote:

Contrary to the misinformation under which you are laboring, you will find that instead of the navy developing commercial opportunities for American financiers it has protected and furthered the interests of all Americans doing business on foreign shores.

Only nine days later an Assistant Secretary of State wrote me:

In reply to your inquiry with reference to Persia, it may be stated that the Department has been informed that a contract was signed by representatives of the Persian Government with the Sinclair Exploration Oil Company, which relates to the granting to that company of a concession in northern Persia. The Department has not been informed that any such concession has yet been ratified by the Persian Parliament. The Department is not informed with reference to the granting to American citizens of any concessions relating to commercial and industrial railway undertakings in Persia.

The Department has no data which show the total present investments of Americans abroad and does not have the information from which such data could be compiled, since Americans do not necessarily inform the Department of their foreign holdings.

Admiral Robert E. Coontz, chief of Naval Operators, said to the National Association of Manufacturers at a meeting in New York City, May 9, 1922:

Our foreign policies are as strong as our fleet and no stronger. . . . Americans have large oil interests in Rumania, and these are protected by our naval forces. . . . It is only the ships of the navy that keep the doors open to foreign markets. . . . The result of this whole West Indian patrol so safeguards our trade in the Caribbean that bananas in certain Central American countries can be sold on the fruit stands in New York cheaper than apples which grow in our very back-yards.

Admiral Coontz asks:

If we spend $300,000,000 a year on the navy and thereby maintain an open market throughout the world for eight billion dollars' worth of exports, is that not a good investment?

Well, in 1920 exports were just over $8,228,000,000 and in 1923 only $4,167,000,000—about half as much. If the navy was worth an appropriation of $300,000,000 in 1920, was it worth only $150,000,000 for maintenance in 1923? Should we fire admirals in the navy when exports fall off?

A few days after we entered the World War the Government took $400,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and deposited it in the bank of J. Pierpont Morgan. The day we went into the war the British Government had overdrawn its bank account with the Morgan bank $400,000,000.

Senator Shipstead of Minnesota recently said in a speech on the floor of the United States Senate:

How much more paper of foreign governments was held in the banks and trust companies affiliated with the Morgan group at that time we have not been informed. But I believe it is reasonable to assume that so many American dollars have found their way to the European battlefields in the shape of war contracts that about $40,000,000,000, 4,000,000 men, and the American flag had to be sent over to protect them. In other words, these loans formed a financial entanglement that later became a political entanglement, which finally led us into the war.

In the World War we "protected" American investors abroad. Shall we do it again?

A Communication The Pioneer Youth of America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What may ultimately prove more significant for America even than the formation of a third party is the modest beginning of a movement to be called the Pioneer Youth of America. This movement having its origin in labor circles seeks to give boys and girls all that is best in the programs of Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, and similar organizations. But with this difference: the new organization definitely and avowedly stands for loyalty to peace rather than war or preparation for war, for the ideal of a fellowship of free human beings rather than the regimentation of 100 per cent Americans.

In suggesting these contrasts I do not want to seem unfair to existing organizations or to minimize the amount of fine human feeling and intelligent devotion to the personal development of boys and girls that they contain. But consider the matter as it appears to the thoughtful worker.

His boy goes to an overcrowded public school; he becomes so much raw material for the educational machine which seeks to turn out standardized Americans. For recreation and a chance at outdoor life the boy joins the Scouts. His leader is, generally speaking, a first-rate chap, blissfully ignorant of, if not prejudiced against, the labor movement and its heroic history in the uplift of the slaves of the machine. He is likewise without any real knowledge of, or sympathy with, the conditions of the boy's life. Only in the vaguest way can he help his troop correlate the standardized Scout program with the world about them. He wants to help the boys get ahead after the approved standards of the American Magazine; he wants them to be patriotic according to the common notion of patriotism, which makes it more vitally a war than a peace virtue. That this is not a harsh characterization of the Scout movement appears from a letter sent out not long ago over the signature of Franklin D. Roosevelt, president of the Boy Scouts Foundation of Greater New York. The occasion of his appeal was the investigation of eleven-year-old Leo Granoff by the New York Bomb Squad. Leo was suspected of the crime of being an ardent young Communist, but not even the Bomb Squad was able to make him out a menace to America. Mr. Roosevelt used Leo as a text on the need of Boy Scout leaders to counteract "the effect of anarchist [sic] propaganda" to which "thousands" of boys "will succumb" just as "did Leo." That is, the Boy Scouts is fundamentally an anti-radical agency.

Now in contradistinction to this the Pioneer Youth of America does not seek to turn out just so many standardized young radicals and young labor unionists. It does seek to give the children of the workers their rightful heritage of understanding and respect for creation rather than acquisition and to impart to them the thrill of labor's struggle for its own emancipation and a better world.

Already the Pioneer Youth of America has been officially indorsed by the international conventions of the Fur Workers and the Ladies Garment Workers; the brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers has contributed $100, and a long list of New York City labor organizations have shown active interest. Out of union men and women and educators the executive committee has been created. Several settlement and church houses and union headquarters have been offered as homes for the new groups and an active campaign for the discovery, selection, and training of leaders is under way. The first considerable beginning will be made with the opening, this summer, of camps for boys and girls at Manumit Farm, Pawling, New York.

In the control of this new organization as large use as possible will be made of self-government within the units. The National Association for Child Development, under which the organization of the Pioneer Youth is proceeding, welcomes parents and friends of children as individual members.

It will be aided in this effort if friendly readers of this article who are interested in this new educational movement will get in touch with the secretary of the National Association for Child Development, Mr. Joshua Libermann, Room 625, 799 Broadway, New York City.

New York City, May 27

NORMAN THOMAS

In the Driftway

IT is evident that unless the age of machinery is to be a complete failure it must invent some decided improvement on the Pullman sleeping-car. The Drifter, after three consecutive nights on these unhappy methods of transportation, would cheerfully trade every Pullman in the United States for a good strong elastic band or what have you. For three nights he has retired, with contortions hardly possible to any but a trained gymnast, in a carefully sealed coffin. He has been surrounded by snoring men, whispering women, and squeaking children. (He has no animus against these persons, whom he regards solely as fellow-sufferers in torture.) And whenever slumber, by one of nature's miracles, seemed imminent, the devilishly ingenious little device in which his clothes were expected quietly to swing would slap fearfully against the window, and all would be lost again.

* * * * *

OF the indignity of climbing into a second-story coffin and not descending therefrom until a step-ladder is hung on a rail by a disinterested second person the Drifter will not speak. Enough that he must crouch on his haunches on the ground floor and watch his fellow-men, who by their lack of ability in climbing obviously prove the anti-Darwinians right, ascend and descend to and from their airy perches. For the porter, the guardian of these Pullman destinies, the Drifter has only sympathy. He, humble servant of a powerful taskmaster, cannot help doling out blankets that weigh a ton and have not a shred of warmth; it is not his fault that the pillows are slightly depressible cubes, on which a man can rest only when the train is not stopping or starting, and from which his head rolls horribly into a deep decline which almost separates it forever from its neck. No, the porter must not be blamed; if he keeps the windows closed tight and the steam on full, it is doubtless under pain of death.

* * * * *

WHEN he has caught up a little on his sleep, the Drifter may be disposed to answer the question which will naturally be put to him; namely, Why not stay at home? He has often thought of that alternative. But long experience has taught him that it is useless, when stern necessity demands he leave his own bed and board, to attempt evading the Pullman. He has tried the day coach and has been submerged in a sea of banana skins and bread crusts; in the chair cars a fog of gentility blinds him. There is no happy solution for the problem and will not be until space has been annihilated. When that glad day arrives, he will drift peaceably from city to city without having to be taken. His feet will carry him short distances and his wish long ones. The Pullman cars will be cast into the Grand Canyon along with Mr. F. P. Adams's discarded razor blades, and sleep will be both wooed and won.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Shall We Restrict the Courts?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Please accept the ardent thanks of this subscriber for printing the series of three valuable articles on the courts in The Nation.

New York, May 17

FLORENCE KELLEY,
General Secretary, National Consumers' League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am very anxious that every lawyer in the United States read the splendid articles on remaking the Supreme Court in The Nation, and thus let many of them get acquainted with a real journal. To this end I am willing to contribute a reasonable sum if I can get a few other lawyers to join me in the task of sending this series to American lawyers.

Cincinnati, May 12

NICHOLAS KLEIN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is of course an error to contend that certain of the framers of the Constitution did not comprehend the power vested by that document in the Supreme Court. The reply of Gouverneur Morris to one who congratulated him on the excellence of the Constitution affords some proof in that direction. He replied in effect that all depended upon how it was construed. The writer, however, will venture the suggestion that had the people of that day been able to visualize the growth of federal power under that instrument it would never have been adopted.

To the average man the new federal government meant merely an agency for correcting the currency, settling the question of import and export duties between the States, and conducting the foreign affairs of the new union.

Blackstone states that in every constitution a power exists which controls without being controlled, whose decisions are supreme. On the face of our Constitution this sovereign power rests with the States or the people. In reality it resides in a close oligarchy of nine men appointed by one branch of the federal government and confirmed by another.

It is idle to contend that a body with such power and so constituted would long continue as the defender of the rights of the States against the encroachments of the federal government. John Randolph of Roanoke was the only one of our earlier statesmen, aside from certain of the framers, who realized the real character of the Constitution, but he was considered as a half-crazed sort of Cassandra, and his warnings went unheeded.

Washington, D. C., May 6

J. L. ELDRIDGE,
Grand President, Railroad Yardmasters of America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Warren thinks that the people could not effect an amendment to the Constitution removing the authority of the Supreme Court over congressional enactments without destroying our federal form of government. He is mistaken. In the first place the Supreme Court admits that the Constitution does not give it such power. It has conceded, in every case since 1803, that the authority vested in it by the Constitution, Article III, Sections 1 and 2, is limited to the interpretation and application of laws of Congress. It has never claimed more than a practical authority to disregard a particular law of Congress in a particular case submitted to its jurisdiction; and it has always based that practical authority on the mere opinion of the majority of five against the minority of four justices that otherwise justice could not be accorded to the plaintiff. Therefore, as far as constitutional authority is concerned, there is no need of an amendment to remove it, because it never existed. If the Supreme Court will not voluntarily amend its own procedure, there may be need of a constitutional amendment to nullify the practical authority of that court to disregard a congressional enactment in the future.

However, it is plain from the foregoing that such an amendment would not interfere with the Constitution itself, and would not in any way whatsoever upset our federal form of government. Moreover, such an amendment may be necessary to give our citizens confidence in the stability of federal law. This is far more important than providing in some way for possible errors of Congress, especially since the President, with the whole people behind him, could easily force any session of Congress to rescind a possibly obnoxious law at any time. Further, the Supreme Court is neither infallible nor impeccable, as history clearly proves. Why try to give it an irresponsible domination over another branch of the federal government, which the Constitution places on an equal plane with it in correlative functioning?

Mr. Warren asserts that opposition to the power of the Supreme Court over congressional acts evinces ignorance of the history of this country. He says that when Justice Marshall rendered his famous decision in 1803 he expressed a view which had been prevalent from the beginning. Why not tell just what that view was? Why not inform his readers that Justice Marshall declared unconstitutional an attempt to give to the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in other cases than those prescribed in the Constitution? Moreover, why confound the constitutional power of the Supreme Court over State legislation with its assumed power over federal legislation since Marshall's time? Besides, the controversies before and after the framing of the Constitution may be interesting. They are well treated by Bryce in his "Studies in History and Jurisprudence." But they are entirely apart from the fact of the written framework of the Constitution as it was formulated and ratified.

I suspect that Mr. Warren is a better historian than a constitutional lawyer. He brings up various disputes in the course of sessions of Congress about the constitutionality of proposed enactments. He refers to decisions of the Supreme Court against proceedings of Congress which were objectionable. But the point is this: one wrong never ethically rights another. If Congress slips, the Supreme Court can advise and "review" but not disregard without culpability on its own part. It makes no practical difference, as far as the stability of federal legislation is concerned, whether that court holds that a law as such is void, or whether it holds that its application in particular cases is rejected. It is time that the relations of the Supreme Court to congressional enactments be settled finally and conclusively and satisfactorily by popular initiation and agitation.

Boston, May 8

FRANCIS J. HORGAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Warren's main conclusion—that judicial review is necessary to the federal system—seems to me unavoidable. From this conclusion it follows that the dangers to liberalism inherent in the powers of the court arise from the attempt to maintain the old balance between the States and the general government, as against the supremacy of the nation. This is another evidence of the fact that many anomalies of our common government proceed from the efforts of the United States, now a nation, to govern itself under a constitution designed for a confederation of once independent States.

Madison, Wisconsin, May 5

CURTIS NETTELS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No one attempts to deny that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. All the Supreme Court does in these scare-head cases is to decide and declare that some legislative enactment is inconsistent with that higher law. There does not seem to be any particular boggy-man in that.

Amherst, New Hampshire, May 21

RICHARD D. WARE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial in The Nation of May 21, entitled Courts or People—Which Shall Rule? you take the view that it would be desirable to supersede our present system of checks and balances, particularly as exemplified in the exercise of its powers by the Supreme Court of the United States, by a legislature to all intents and purposes supreme.

Without wasting time in discussion, let me state that until the time shall come when the voters develop a sufficiently high sense of their own civic duty to see to it that abler and less selfish men are sent to Congress as their representatives than in general seems to have been the case for many years, we are indeed fortunate that the powers of Congress are no greater than they are. We are also fortunate that we have a Supreme Court empowered to declare void any act of Congress which violates the supreme law of the land, that is, the Constitution, which after all is a charter of rights of the people.

Conservative the Supreme Court indeed may be; perhaps its decisions are not always enlightened. Its learned members are after all only human. But that the court's honor and integrity, in the rendering of its decisions, cannot be assailed few will doubt. Can the same thing be said for the spirit with which Congress attends to its work? And yet you would have the legislature supreme!

In conclusion let me suggest for your consideration the thought that the immediate problem should not be to limit the powers of the Supreme Court, but rather to arouse the voters to a better understanding of their own rights and obligations as citizens, to the end that they will elect to Congress only men of the highest caliber. Then, as day follows night, there will be fewer and better laws, and there need be little fear of court rule instead of a rule by the people.

CHARLES TROWBRIDGE TITTMANN

Washington, D. C., May 19

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If it were true, as Mr. Charles Warren asserts in the May 7 issue of The Nation, that the Supreme Court protects citizens against legislative encroachments on constitutionally guaranteed rights, its nullification of statutes would be defensible. But does it do this unless there is some big financial interest at stake? Twice has the court set aside legislation against child labor on the ground of State's rights. The last time it went so far as to declare an act taxing child-labor products as void because its real object was not revenue but to prohibit child labor. The same argument would apply to the 10 per cent tax on State issues of currency, but the court has not applied it, and no one thinks that it would. One cannot avoid noticing that in the child-labor case strong financial interests wanted the law set aside, while in the currency case the nation's combined financial interests favor the law.

The record of the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, in setting aside through injunction proceedings the right of trial by jury does not strengthen the claim to guardianship of constitutional rights. Even worse is the record made by the court in upholding the espionage act and conscription act, the one an act abridging freedom of speech, the other forcing into involuntary servitude in the army persons not guilty of crime. That these clear violations of the Constitution were upheld unanimously by the court shows that it is unsafe to trust with such power even a liberal like Justice Brandeis.

Baltimore, Maryland, May 4

SAMUEL DANZIGER

Texas

By WILLIAM A. NORRIS

1.

Against an unclouded sky
Is one long curve of brown sun-bitten turf,
And at the top
A bunch of cactus.

I have looked so long at this
That the sky has crept down upon the hill,
And the hill has withdrawn immeasurable distances into the sky.

And now the cactus is a colossal creature,
Black on a far horizon,
With jointed bulbous limbs,
Stark and misshapen,
And holding motionless against the sky
The hundred daggers of its wrath.

2.

I have seen the sunset in mountain lands
Pouring its fiery wine into the deep cup of the valley.
I have seen the sunset tangled in tops of trees.
I have seen it imprisoned in a still lake.

But here it spills its flame on to flat horizons.
It spreads to the north and south,
And its edges meet in the east.
It lies around me like a hoop of fire,
Until the darkness comes, suddenly, silently,
With many stars.

Books

The President's Mind

The Price of Freedom. By Calvin Coolidge. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THIS book is not, of course, life blood, nor is it by a master spirit, nor will it be long treasured, but it does allow one partially to enter the mind of its author. It reveals the psyche of the Chief Executive as his "Have Faith in Massachusetts" bespoke the mind of the law-and-order Governor. If style is the man one can generalize that in this instance the author is lacking in the penetrating keenness and realism which distinguish cogent and lucid thought, and that he relies heavily on college training in theme-writing for the expression of such commonplace notions as he does entertain. Words and sentences bury each other with mechanical precision, and when rhetoric is attempted turgidity is achieved. The mind that produced this book is not animated by fervid passion; it does not attain even a dull glow; it is a mind without heat and without light.

This mind rests on the two pillars of religion and morals, both of the ultra-conventional sort, and the superstructure is of second-hand timber. History is conceived of teleologically, revealing the progress of transcendental religious and moral truths to their culminating expression in American institutions and history. The history of the United States is useful as teaching by example the fundamental verities of political practice, impregnated, as it has ever been, by the two truths mentioned. The churches and the schools are the institutions which should teach the youth these truths, supplemented of course by such related notions as the origin of the Anglo-Saxon urge to freedom in the Teutonic folkmoot and its final fruition in the Constitution of 1787. A thorough grounding in the classics, with additional discipline in mathematics, should be provided. The aid of the social sciences is not required for the strategy of the statesman in the analysis and solution of the perplexities of contemporary problems. Ideals, particularly the American ideal of individualism, should play a large role, modified, however, by a realization that economic activity may require regulation, although always in homoeopathic doses administered with gentleness. People should be discouraged from striving too fervently for complete freedom. Law is an integral part of social morality and obedience to law is liberty, for "complete freedom means complete obedience to law." Obedience should be inculcated from the cradle and maintained to the grave—"More and more emphasis needs to be placed on the duty of obedience." "Law and order" appear to be the law of the police court and the order of Judge Gary. Things as they are may be faulty, but they are not as bad as they might be, and a recognition of their good points is the best policy—"There is no place for the cynic or the pessimist." Never recognize progress until it has been accomplished, and "the law of progress is the law of obedience." "The most pressing requirement of the present hour is not how we are to solve our economic problems," but it is to search for the eternal realities, to "justify the existing form of government in our republic," to teach patriotism, and to make impressive the necessity for "service of sacrifice." Radicals are wasters and are all advocating reforms proved false by the past experience of the race. "The great principles of life do not change; they are permanent and well-known."

In short, a blue-print of a ubiquitous, conservative mind, with none of the erudition or the mellow urbanity of a Balfour or a Milner or a Nicholas Murray Butler. There is nowhere betrayed an elementary knowledge of economics, sociology, social psychology, culture-history, or even a realistic view of politics. The complexities of contemporary industrialism are brushed aside in passing. The economic principles which served to balance the budget of a parsimonious New England family are adequate to cope with exigencies of federal and international finance. There is not the slightest recognition of the relativity of truth. The vapidness of the conception of history is painful. And the lack of application of the dissociative technic to the words "religious" and "spiritual" (they are used as synonyms indifferently) and "ideals" is evidence of the loose thinking everywhere the rule. Mr. Coolidge's educational equipment appears to be the product of a laborious and conscientious, if rather naive and wooden absorption of the more formal instruction dispensed at Amherst in 1895. But he seems to have failed signally in acquiring the subtle and discriminating insight into political realities possessed by Professor Anson D. Morse, the critical spirit and dialectical acumen manifested by Professor Charles E. Garman, or the careful and painstaking analysis of socio-economic problems insisted upon by John Bates Clark. Subsequent wissenschaftliche Ausbildung apparently has been derived from the Christian Herald, apothegms of Dr. Frank Crane, and the editorials of the Hampshire Gazette and the Springfield Union. All that one finds, in short, is a mediocre mind fed by an arid culture.

On politics and politicians Mr. Coolidge is the reverse of realistic. All of his addresses are of figures supernaturally inspired by an invincible moral and religious idealism, and hovering over the rest of mankind in an ethereal void—McKinley, Roosevelt, Lincoln, Washington, Hamilton, and Andrew Carnegie alike. "We see in great men a brighter gleam of the Infinite." "It is only when men begin to worship that they begin to grow." But adoration blunts the edge of criticism, and the monotonous repetition of eulogy quickly brings into operation the law of diminishing returns. All of these notables contributed to a more complete triumph of the American spirit, conceived of as analyzed above, all are men of superior genius, all are conservative, and we realize why "The old American spirit lives again in President Harding." It is significant that the figure Mr. Coolidge is suspicious of is Jefferson. Of Grant's unfortunate, if nothing more, naivete nothing is said, for the scandals are not mentioned. Of Lincoln: "He was not radical, but a conservative. . . . What an answer he is to all those who would tear down." Hamilton's chief contribution was to advocate "The principle of integrity in governmental affairs." Of McKinley: "His genius, his greatness elude us." And of the others his remarks are equally cogent. Mr. Coolidge believes that "no one doubts that the delegates to the Paris Conference were inspired by that noble ideal," the ideal of securing new guaranties of peace, and that "the chief element in [the World War] was a contest between forms of government." (Uttered May 30, 1923.) At least he says he does. The book is, in brief, one which will make an intelligent reader sick at heart, but one which will furnish excerpts for a cleverly edited campaign pamphlet that might well earn for the author a million votes among "the homely folk" who make up the backbone of the nation and who quite rightly feel that Calvin is one of them.

In early New England men of Mr. Coolidge's type made excellent selectmen, but, contrary to the opinion of estimable people, ability of that order does not qualify the owner for so complex and important a position as that of President of the United States in the twentieth century. There is appositeness in quoting words out of his own mouth: "Innocence is not enough in the administration of public affairs."

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Stable Money

Monetary Reform. By John Maynard Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

ENGLAND is enjoying a first-class debate on monetary theory. Professor Cannan and the Londoners are urging that the way to make prices stable is to control currency and let credit go, while Mr. Keynes and his Cambridge associates are maintaining that the real way to turn the trick is to manage credit, and let currency take care of itself. The London group are fighting a rear-guard action, but of course they are clad in the mantle of financial respectability that has always covered the nakedness of the advocates of "sound money." Since sound money disappeared in the flames of war, however, almost any kind of monetary theorist is good enough for Europe, provided his theory offers promise of stable prices. Mr. Keynes's new book is a fairly simple argument, essentially sound, for a "managed" currency system based on the control of credit.

He first shows how inflation cheats the investing class, to the advantage of the business class, and, as he maintains—mistakenly, I believe—of the organized workers. Then he shows that inflation is the unfailing resource of hard-pressed governments. For hundreds of years, in fact, ever since money was invented, the necessities of governments and the political power of debtors have led to a progressive depreciation of the money unit. The war has but written the latest chapter of the story. Inflation is a device whereby peoples prevent the rentier from absorbing more than a certain due proportion of the social income.

What then is to be done now, with nearly every monetary unit in the world gone hopelessly to smash—deflate or devalue? Soberly considering the evils involved in each policy, Mr. Keynes comes out squarely, without any wringing of hands over the morals of it, for devaluation as of course the only possible policy for most countries. Having got out of the present mess in that way, what then?

As between stable internal prices and an attempt to maintain stable foreign exchanges, Mr. Keynes is unhesitatingly for the former—a wise choice. Regarding the stability of prices, credit, and employment as of paramount importance, as indeed it is, he feels no confidence that an old-fashioned gold standard would give even such stability as existed before the war. He likewise rejects Mr. Hawtrey's suggestion of a new gold standard managed jointly with the United States, because it would make England too dependent on the Federal Reserve Board, of whose wisdom and power Mr. Keynes is not unjustly a bit skeptical. His own solution is remarkably like that urged by Foster and Catchings for the United States. He would have the British Treasury and the Bank of England by joint action control the money supply through the buying and selling of securities and the manipulation of the bank rate. Such a solution will be anathema to those ante-bellum theorists who still cling to the superstition that there is some magic, self-regulating virtue in the gold standard, and to their lineal descendants who believe that the amount of currency automatically determines prices. On the other hand, that body of theorists who have learned the bitter lesson taught by the war, and who have discovered the causative force of bank credit in the business cycle, will welcome Mr. Keynes's book as a courageous attempt to apply practically the principles of monetary value that are at last becoming clear even to the stupid. Our efforts to leave the regulation of the money supply in the hands of a beneficent Providence have issued in flat failure. If governments and central banks between them have not intelligence enough and character enough to maintain a stable price level, then our capitalistic organization of industry will go to the dogs and will deserve to. But Mr. Keynes, like the whole new school of dynamic economic theorists, thinks better of our modern intelligence than that. He believes that we are learning, and that we shall solve our problems by using our brains. At any rate, his book points out the direction in which we must go.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Two Sophisticates

Prancing Nigger. By Ronald Firbank. Introduction by Carl Van Vechten. Brentano's. $2.

Green Shoots. By Paul Morand. Preface by Marcel Proust. Introduction by A. B. Walkley. Thomas Seltzer. $1.75.

RONALD FIRBANK, introduced by Carl Van Vechten as the only contemporary writer with a really light touch, has indeed produced a little tale entirely sui generis and with a flavor undeniably intriguing if undoubtedly "high." To Mr. Van Vechten I am indebted for the whole of my knowledge of this author but his first "slender" volume (1905) was, so I learn, "bound in gray wrappers, stamped in gold" and was also issued in "a tall paper edition, limited to ten copies, bound in vellum"; moreover, at least one of his works was illustrated by Felicien Rops, and these facts are not without significance. They seem to place him among those who consciously write for the few, producing highly spiced plates for the more knowing of literary gourmets, and such he is.

An elegant searcher after flamboyant decoration and highly piquant sauces, he deliberately betook himself to the British West Indies in search of material, and this story of a Negro banana grower and his wife, who leave their hut in the country to seek social advantages for their daughter in the metropolis, is the result. Now the fausse ingénue is notoriously the most piquant of characters, and no ignorance was ever less innocent than that of the melting daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Mouth who, grown plump and languishing in voluptuous idleness, was ignorant of nothing which concerns the tender passion except clothes and the other civilized devices by which it is made more elaborate and perverse. Mr. Firbank leads her and her family across the savannahs, languid with heat and sleepy with the odor of voluptuous flowers, to the town of Cuna-Cuna, where the simplicity of the savage meets in the cafe, the dance hall, and the opera house with the corruption of civilization and manners are at once naive and decadent. With genuine humor and the utter sophisticate's thorough relish of the delicately scabrous, Mr. Firbank tells the story of their adventures there and he makes of it something utterly exotic, utterly fascinating, and, it must be admitted, utterly depraved—something as simple and as corrupt as "Daphnis and Chloe." Perhaps there is in the tropics a fruit which like the medlar, beloved of Elizabethan poets, is not ripe until it is rotten; if so its flavor must be very like that of "Prancing Nigger."

Paul Morand, who is taken very seriously indeed by Marcel Proust, is no less "civilized" than Mr. Firbank in his purely aesthetic attitude toward life but he is, I believe, younger and hence he can still find a land of unreal color closer home. A young Frenchman, who was a student at Oxford and who passed some of the early war years in London, he there discovered or imagined a Bohemia extraordinary enough and careless enough to intrigue his fancy, and he has described the adventures, comic and sentimental, of his sophisticated soul. A. B. Walkley, who shares with Proust the task of introduction, is somewhat amazed at the London described, contenting himself when the question of verisimilitude is concerned with a shrugging "perhaps." With like incredulity one may wonder if the originals of the three feminine portraits presented were really so remarkable. One suspects that, seen through eyes less determined to find the baffling, this collector of antiquities, this mysterious widow, and this sensational dancer might seem less unusual; but no doubt it does not matter. Mr. Morand has a personal and charming style and a very pretty talent at analyzing complexities, even if he does invent them first, so that when one comes to a passage like the following it would be merely churlish not to cry "Bravo."

She paints her stuffs, dyes her carpets, bleaches her hair, tints her cats. Around her she has a thousand objects destined for other uses than one would suppose them, books which open into boxes, telescopic penholders, chairs which become tables, tables which transform themselves into screens, and also those innumerable surprise-box trinkets which we owe to the bad taste of the Italians and Japanese. . . . "I am planning an artificial garden," she says. . . . "One would lie down on moss of that beautiful green that only dyed moss has, warm and powdery to the touch. All round there will be flower beds of colored beads, tissue-paper flowers, and beneath oil-cloth foliage, in a cast-glass pool, the congealed frolicking of gutta serena carp."

In addition to humor, both Mr. Firbank and Mr. Morand have a very complicated sensibility, but their aesthetic attitude is without either moral or immoral enthusiasm. I should rest content with praise of their entertaining quality did not the portentousness with which their sponsors discuss their "art" give me pause. Both of the writers under discussion are intensely occupied with "style"; both produce "pure literature" without any implications for life; and hence their books will be hailed as among the important events of the season by that group of critics to whom whatever literature touches life as it is lived seems always a little vulgar. But to me, I confess, it seems that a literature so "pure" is somewhat anemic, and that really great books do come home to men's bosoms and concern themselves with their affairs. Men can write well and still have something to say, can produce art which is not above but a part of life. For such I reserve my highest admiration because they alone can be passionate, and passion alone is great. "Moral earnestness" is a terrible phrase but writers as diverse as Anatole France, D. H. Lawrence, H. L. Mencken, and Aldous Huxley have it; and what important writer has not? The literature of escape is still but a minor affair, whether it escape into a nurse-maid's paradise or transport the most impeccable aesthete into a far region of art whither the prayers and curses of his fellow-men never penetrate.

J. W. KRUTCH

Greek Feminism

Feminism in Greek Literature from Homer to Aristotle. By F. A. Wright. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

MR. WRIGHT'S book has all of the vices and some of the virtues of the brilliant scholar, Verrall, whose influence is evident in nearly all recent classical scholarship in England. The vices arise from too ardent a desire to bring the Greeks and Romans into line with modern problems; the virtues spring from a keen sensitiveness to the human side of ancient literature. And like the others of the Verrall tradition, Mr. Wright seeks to establish Euripides as the center of his effort to adjust the classics to modern interests, because the great dramatist's exploitation of the emotional side of life makes him seem to the present generation the most human of ancient writers. Almost any program of spiritual liberation or of social reform can be foisted upon him with some show of plausibility, on the basis of the compassion he arouses for all kinds of human suffering.

The many-sidedness of Euripides and his dramatic imagination are cleverly utilized by this school of interpreters. Passages that are not altogether at variance with the apostolic critic's views are exhibited as the key to the poet's message on the particular problem which the critic has taken as his thesis, while the plot and other evidence which disallow or even contradict this interpretation are dismissed by the ingenious explanation that these are the concessions Euripides was forced to make to the "existing order." The poet's weakness in plot construction, wherein improbabilities are more frequent than is usual even in Greek drama, is regarded as an intentional reductio ad absurdum of sacred stories, designed to undermine the faith of the populace in traditional religion and ethics.

Such critical technique as this would be called into play to prove Shakespeare favorable to the Volstead amendment on the basis of Sir Toby's behavior in "Much Ado About Nothing," or Rostand to pacifism because of Roxane's sufferings in "Cyrano de Bergerac."

Mr. Wright's thesis is feminism. Ostensibly he is reviewing Greek literature from Homer to Aristotle with a view to finding the estimation in which woman is held at different times and in different writers. Really he is trying to prove the assertion of his introduction "that the Greek world perished from one main cause, a low ideal of womanhood and a degradation of women which found expression both in literature and in social life," and to make it clear that his favorite authors, particularly Euripides, set themselves against this current and tried to stem it. For the first position not one scintilla of evidence is adduced save detailed illustration of the generally acknowledged fact that in the main woman was held in low esteem in Greece. That post hoc does not necessarily mean propter hoc appears never to occur to him. Moreover, he attributes this low position to the spread of false ideas about women from Ionia to Athens and from Athens to the rest of Greece, ignoring the economic and other forces which were powerful factors in determining woman's social status.

The second aim of Mr. Wright, that of exonerating his favorite authors from implication in this disgraceful chapter of Greek history, has Euripides as its storm center. From him the other feminists are supposed to derive their inspiration. Chronology, to be sure, forbade arraying Homer and Sappho under the Euripidean banner. Mr. Wright, however, admires their poetry sufficiently to make him wish to give them a clean bill of health and this he achieves in the case of Homer by the expurgation of all extended erotic episodes, as well as of those which represent Hera, mistress of heaven, as quarrelsome; in the case of Sappho by gallantly challenging the traditions which cast aspersions upon her fair name, traditions which certainly have slender foundation, though not more slender than other supposed knowledge concerning her life.

The transformation of Euripides, traditionally known as "woman hater," into arch-feminist is accomplished by the technique above described. The chief members of the coterie which gathered around him and derived inspiration from his ideas Mr. Wright believes were Socrates, Xenophon, Aristophanes, and their friends. Plato, usually cited as the chief advocate of woman's intellectual and political enfranchisement, is hardly admitted by Mr. Wright to membership in the group because the women of his Utopia, though freed from enslavement to individual husbands, still, like other property, belonged to the state. Mr. Wright might have found more cogent reasons than this for doubting the feminism of Socrates and Xenophon. As for Aristophanes, the tour de force by which the comedian whose ribald satire of women's aspirations to independence has sent peals of laughter down the ages is dragged into the camp of his enemies is an astonishing piece of literary interpretation. It is soberly asserted that "most of Aristophanes's obscenity is an empty parade made necessary by the conditions of the Attic stage which Aristophanes himself in the course of his career rendered obsolete." On this basis it is assumed that the social movement most flagrantly travestied in the comedies, feminism, and two of the individuals most mercilessly satirized, Socrates and Euripides, were particularly dear to Aristophanes's heart.

While Aristophanes and Euripides figure in Mr. Wright's pages as the chief friends of women, Sophocles, the creator of that galaxy of noble heroines, Antigone, Electra, Tecmessa, and Deianeira, is regarded as hostile to woman's aspirations toward a larger life.

The book illustrates once more the futility of the effort to waken interest in the classics by exaggerating their bearing upon modern problems. Ancient literature must stand or fall by its own beauty and significance, not by values borrowed from a world alien to it.

CLARA M. SMERTENKO

A Romance of Science

Pierre Curie. By Marie Curie. Translated by Charlotte and Vernon Kellogg. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

THE life of the Curies is the outstanding romance in the brief epoch of science. Drawn to each other by their common interest in the search for truth they shared privations, hardships, and hopes. Their discovery of radium proved the most sensational event in the history of chemistry. It revolutionized basic concepts and made the alchemists' dream of transmuting elements a scientific reality.

They were pioneers, this slim Polish girl who came to Paris for her studies in the early nineties, and the tall auburn-haired student, eight years her senior. "He described to me his days, filled with work, and his dream of an existence entirely devoted to science. . . . We were married in the simplest way. I wore no unusual dress . . . only a few friends present." And they continued to live in the simplest way, spending their days and often their evenings in the laboratory. This was an abandoned store-room, a wooden shed with a leaky roof, without hoods to carry off the poisonous and irritating gases released by the experiments, the bitter cold of winter only a little lessened by a small iron stove. Here they worked unaided.

It was exhausting [Mme Curie writes] to move about the great containers filled with liquids. . . . Sometimes I had to spend a whole day mixing a boiling mass with a heavy iron rod nearly as large as myself. I would be broken with fatigue at the day's end. Other days, on the contrary, the work would be a most minute and delicate fractional crystallization in the effort to concentrate and purify the product when the floating particles of coal and iron would be a serious handicap.

Often their luncheon consisted of a cup of tea partaken at their task. Yet over these material difficulties their ardor triumphed.

Recognition from Paul Curie's fellow-countrymen came slowly. In 1903 he was offered the Legion of Honor, which he declined in these words: "I do not in the least feel the need of a decoration, but I do feel the greatest need for a laboratory." This need was not filled until too late. In 1906 when the reward he craved—the opportunity to devote all his time to research—seemed in sight, he was struck by a truck and killed.

Upon his wife devolved not only the care and education of their two children, the younger of whom was but two years old, but the carrying on of their work for mankind. The mechanical handicaps continued. She too declined the Legion of Honor for the same reason as her husband. Like every true scientist she steadfastly refused to commercialize her great contributions to humanity. The Nobel prize award in 1911 helped Mme Curie's personal budget somewhat, but the equipping of a modern laboratory still languished. France's failure to make adequate provision for her most distinguished and useful scientist will always be an unmitigated reproach.

Then came the war and under its pressure radium-therapy received a new impetus. Four years Mme Curie and her elder daughter spent close to the firing-line and in the emergency hospitals. There she learned "to hate the very idea of war. It ought to be sufficient," she writes, "to see once what I have seen so many times, all through these years."

The epilogue of the Curie story concerns America. An American, Mrs. William Brown Meloney, editor of the Delineator, deeply moved by the irony of finding the savior of so many lives a simple woman with roughened hands "working in an inadequate laboratory and living in a simple apartment on the meager pay of a French professor," wrote a new and stirring chapter in international cooperation. Among American women she raised a fund of $100,000 to purchase one gramme of radium for its discoverer, which neither the French Government nor the French public had found a way to do. Mme Curie came to America to receive it, bringing her two daughters on the first real vacation of her life. Here scientific societies delighted to honor her, universities showered her with degrees, everywhere she was acclaimed and feted. The President of the United States, in the name of America's women, delivered their gift to the foremost scientist of their sex.

Marie Curie's life of her husband, together with much autobiographical material, as presented to the American public, suffers needlessly at the hands of its translators who transcribe from the French such phrases as "he definitely quitted the school," and "the train rested immovable," and whose rendering is uniformly stodgy. The romance and achievement of the Curies, however, like the element which they discovered, is radiant.

ERNEST GRUENING

The Library and the Community

The American Public Library. By Arthur E. Bostwick. Third edition, revised and enlarged. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

TWO or three generations ago public libraries were few and rather constrained in their activities, but it was nevertheless possible to point to certain fairly obvious results of the presence, and use, of their books.

A community of 450,000, which consumes yearly 140 million newspapers, is a different community from what it was when it consumed a few thousand only. And an institution which was mildly helpful then will be only negligible now unless it adopts methods of administration that make it affect its larger community. Formerly—and largely still—a library was content to gather books and make them easily accessible to the public. But now, before the public even approaches with interest these easily accessible books it has been deluged with print, has waded through print, has been influenced by headlines, true news, false news, and doctored news until it enjoys a degree of sophistication of which our ancestors of two or three generations ago had no conception.

The amount of print produced and consumed by the people of this country is today so much greater than it was, say, fifty years ago that it puts the portion of that print which public libraries furnish in an entirely different position from that which it once occupied. This relative change in the position a public library's books now hold in the world's reading should lead to drastic changes in library management. Hence the fact that the third edition of Mr. Bostwick's "The American Public Library" does not touch upon the changes forced on our public libraries, especially within the last fifteen years, is a disappointment to those who approach it with a realization of these changes.

The book is a survey of activities in modern American libraries, New York predominating as an example especially in the descriptions of branch libraries, on account of Mr. Bostwick's experience as chief of circulation in that city. As its preface indicates, it is "a succinct record of facts put into readable shape" and a "bird's-eye view of library economy." It is concerned to a considerable extent with technique, but this it treats from the standpoint of the lecturer rather than from that of the instructor, with intention to convey a knowledge of what is done, not with an attempt to teach how it is done.

While I agree with Mr. Bostwick on many points, I note a few omissions. No method of keeping pamphlets other than in envelopes filed vertically is described, though a short chapter could have been given to the importance and the technique of handling such loose material. Maps are mentioned only as accessories to reference work, though in at least one large library many are dissected, mounted on single sheets of linen, folded, enveloped, and lent as books. No mention is made of other Wilson publications than the Readers' Guide. In regard to the connection between museums and libraries, no account is given of lending collections issued to teachers and others, a practice quite successfully carried out in one of our libraries for some years. And several recent books and articles written by librarians on the new type of museums are not added to the bibliography. The only statement referring to useful museums quoted is that of an English librarian made in 1903. The growth and activities of the Special Libraries Association since 1909 is not recorded and certain references have not been brought to date. Some recognized time-savers, of use particularly to new libraries, are not mentioned.

Mr. Bostwick ignores certain well-known differences of opinion which exist between librarians on matters of theory. Yearly inventories, which he considers obligatory, are thought wasteful by others, who hold that money needed for direct service and book purchase produces merely negative statistics when used for inventories. This conclusion does not condemn inventory-taking per se but would make it an occasional sorrow instead of an annual duty. No inventory keeps a book from being walked off with; it often incites to restrictions, and restricted books are only half alive. Whether library buildings of the future will be built as community clubhouses with provisions for drama and the movies is a doubtful and not, to all, a desirable prophecy; and the suggestion of sound-proof concert chambers accompanying reference collections of music also meets with strong opposition. Standardization of training of library workers and censorship are subjects too large and too lightly touched upon by Mr. Bostwick to call for discussion here; though one may say that the necessity for reading "from cover to cover" all but a very few novels before purchase is a pronouncement to which some librarians are far from signatory.

JOHN COTTON DANA

Labors of the Sun

Eclipses of the Sun. By S. A. Mitchell. Columbia University Press. $3.85.

SINCE Queen Dido's bard sang to Aeneas and his companions the story of the moon and the "labors" of the sun, eclipses have appealed to popular interest. Professor Mitchell's book on this favorite theme is welcome, not only to the astronomer but to the layman.

Probably not more than one person in a thousand has ever seen a total solar eclipse. Mr. Mitchell has successfully observed four, each time as a member of an expedition from the United States Naval Observatory. The "labors" of the astronomer may be realized when we read that he has traveled 40,000 miles and obtained less than eleven minutes for making scientific observations.

The historical review of eclipse observations, covering a period of more than four thousand years, is told with poetic allusion and stray bits of humor. Beginning with the earliest recorded eclipse in Chinese annals, the account is brought down to the latest developments. Little by little has been added to our knowledge, but the greatest progress has been made since photography has largely superseded eye observations. Mr. Mitchell describes more particularly the eclipses of 1900, 1901, 1905, and 1918, which he observed, relating his experiences in Sumatra, Spain, and America, in graphic detail. We feel that we are in the field with him, sharing the alternation of hope and fear as to clouds on the eventful day, and finally glimpse the sublimity of the spectacle. It seems strange, however, that no mention is made in the book of "shadow-bands" among eclipse phenomena.

Mr. Mitchell's work has been chiefly with the "flash spectrum," which occurs at the instant when the moon is just covering or uncovering the sun. From his photographs he finds the heights of the different vapors in the solar atmosphere. He devotes two chapters to the corona, that pearly crown surrounding the eclipsed sun, and an enigma to astronomers. It is a very able presentation of our knowledge about this mysterious appendage to the sun. Among other theories of its cause, he advances one of his own. He supposes that vast numbers of electrons, discharged from the sun, impinge on atoms in the coronal region. The energy transformed according to recent researches can easily give rise to light and the other phenomena noted.

The book is really a treatise on the sun. Indeed, the whole subject is so related to progress in physical science that the author has felt free to introduce chapters on the spectroscope, the structure of the atom, and the importance of ionization, as well as an exposition of the Einstein theory. They should be read by all who wish to obtain a non-technical idea of these matters. In view of the popular enthusiasm over the confirmation of Einstein's prediction at the eclipse of 1919, Mr. Mitchell's extreme judicial attitude toward the theory of relativity is disappointing, as it gives the idea of aloofness. Even the remarkably accordant results of the Lick astronomers at the Australian eclipse do not seem entirely convincing to him, and he cites the predicted Einstein shift in the solar spectrum as unconfirmed. Had he written since the very recent announcement of the verification of this important point by St. John of the Mount Wilson Observatory, he would doubtless have expressed himself otherwise.

Mr. Mitchell has produced a book of great interest. Astronomers will appreciate the wealth of facts and the suggestions drawn from the practical experience of the author. The general reader will find a clear, attractive, and up-to-date exposition of the knowledge acquired in the fleeting seconds of total solar eclipses.

EDWARD SKINNER KING

Books in Brief

An Anthology of Verse by American Negroes. Edited with a Critical Introduction, Biographical Sketches of the Authors, and Bibliographical Notes by Newman Ivey White and Walter Clinton Jackson. Durham, N. C.: Trinity College Press. $2.

A valuable collection covering about the same ground as that covered by Mr. Robert T. Kerlin in his recent volume. Both books are interesting as evidence of the fact that the poetic energies of the Negro race are at present directed away from folk-rhymes to more ambitious and more serious if as yet less successful forms.

Out of Silence and Other Poems. By Arthur Davison Ficke. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

Lovely, cool verse by the accomplished author of "Sonnets of a Portrait Painter." Mr. Ficke fashions as graceful a line as is to be found in contemporary American poetry. Without conspicuous strength, he eminently succeeds by virtue of his intelligence and his purity of tone.

High Road. By Janet Ramsay. The Century Company. $2.

The prejudice of a college professor against his son's musical career rings false. Except for this single failure to convince, however, Janet Ramsay has written a first novel which makes up in sincere and intelligent objectiveness what it lacks of twentieth-century self-consciousness. The story ends with a dramatic situation that is crystal clear, both as to plausibility and skill of treatment.

The Eyes of Max Carrados. By Ernest Bramah. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Many detective-story writers believe, to their cost, that complexity is identical with mystery and that the grotesque is always terrible. Mr. Bramah does not once delude himself in these respects. He recounts the achievements of the blind Max Carrados with a deftness and restraint that render them at once sufficiently plausible and highly diverting.

Human Life as the Biologist Sees It. By Vernon Kellogg. Henry Holt and Company. $1.50.

This is an interesting little volume in which is presented the material given by Mr. Kellogg as Colver Lecturer at Brown University in 1921. It is sometimes thought that scientific men possess in some presumably mystic fashion a sort of super-knowledge of many of the great problems with which mortals are confronted on every hand, and concerning which the great mass of people are ignorant. When, therefore, a noted scientist makes a statement regarding one of these problems, be it in lecture or interview or book, there is usually considerable interest manifested in order to acquire the super-knowledge thus disseminated. In this volume we have a biologist telling us what he thinks about such great problems as human origin, war, heredity, death, the soul, and the future. The knowledge of the scientist in this case, however, does not appear to be of the super-variety, but rather of the more common sort which most well-educated people have.

Satan's Bushel. By Garet Garrett. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Mr. Garrett has written what might be described as a narrative of wheat garnished with fiction. One derives from his pages considerable illumination concerning the functioning of the wheat market, but rather little light on the human heart. Those who relish economics in story form will find "Satan's Bushel" to their taste.

International Relations Section

White Australia

By G. C. T. GILES

THE contrast in growth and development between the United States and Australia is startling. The area of the two countries is practically the same, but the population of Australia is less than 6,000,000, or not much more than one-twentieth of that of the United States.

During the last hundred years, while the population of the United States has increased from 1,000,000 to 110,000,000, the population of Australia has increased from 40,000 to 5,500,000. Only 16,000,000 acres—about 1 per cent of the whole area—are under crop as against 300,000,000 acres in the United States. Railway mileage in Australia amounts to 26,000 or less than one-tenth of the mileage in the States. In spite of a high tariff Australian manufactures are comparatively insignificant; the pastoral and agricultural industries remain Australia's chief assets.

No doubt the geographical isolation of Australia—she is distant over 12,000 miles from the chief centers of European population—has been the most important reason for her slow development. Climatic and physical handicaps have also played a part: nearly one-third of Australia lies in the tropics, while an equally large area has an average annual rainfall of less than ten inches. It is only of recent years that improved agricultural methods, the discovery of vast areas of artesian and sub-artesian water, and the development of irrigation have opened up considerable areas hitherto considered desert and useless. But while these natural factors have undoubtedly been the chief causes of Australia's isolation, it is undeniable that the majority of Australians have gloried in their isolation and even, in the last few decades, deliberately striven to maintain and enhance it by a policy of immigration restriction. The White Australia Policy is still accepted as a sacred and unassailable dogma by an overwhelming majority of the Australian people.

It may be—and indeed is—argued that the White Australia Policy involves the exclusion of Asiatic and colored peoples only. It is true that the dictation test, by which that policy is enforced, is seldom applied to any but colored immigrants. But in practice the absolute exclusion of Asiatics and colored peoples is accompanied by a frank discouragement of immigration of any kind—with a slight qualification in favor of a few carefully selected immigrants of British stock. Officially the White Australia Policy is interpreted as the expression of a deep-rooted feeling of racial purity. Actually it goes much further than that. To the man in the street it means "Australia for the Australians" and his dislike for the "Pommy"—as he dubs the immigrant Britisher—is only one degree less active than his hostility toward Dagoes, Dutchmen, "niggers," "Chinks," and Japs. In discussing the White Australia Policy with an Australian labor leader I pointed out that the economic objection to colored immigrants was not altogether sound, in view of the fact that the Chinese in the country soon aspired to the higher standard of living which they saw around them. He agreed that this was so, but added: "Well, anyway, we don't want them here—nor Dagoes either." This seemed to be an expression of racial prejudice, and I inquired if he had any objection to British immigrants. He retorted with an ironic and good-natured smile: "Yes, we don't want any damned Pommies either!" This exclusionist attitude is common to a very large number of the Australian workers. It is the product of many different instincts and emotions. There is in it a dash of crude nationalism—akin to 100 per cent Americanism—a streak of pure dog-in-the-manger selfishness, a determination to maintain the economic standard and conditions which place the Australian working-man among the aristocrats of labor, and a deal of contempt for the effete and worn-out peoples of Europe. During the last fifty years Australians have striven to create a country free from the social and industrial evils of the Old World, a working-man's paradise. To some extent they have succeeded. It will probably prove to be correct that Australian labor has modified capitalism as far as it can be modified without being destroyed or replaced. It is claimed with some justice that present-day Australia offers to the mass of the people a fuller, freer, and securer life than they can enjoy anywhere else in the world, together with a climate which makes life easy and enjoyable. It is hardly surprising that the average Australian has so far guarded these privileges with jealous zeal.

While the attitude of Australian labor then has been one of frank hostility to any general policy of immigration, the attitude of employers and landowners has been one of practical indifference. The manufacturer has been protected in the home market by a high tariff and has therefore been able to pay high wages without fear of foreign competition, while he has not yet attempted to cater for the export trade. The big landowners are divided between a desire for cheap labor and a fear of expropriation, should a vigorous immigration policy create a demand for the subdivision of large estates.

Thus there has been no body of opinion in Australia sufficiently interested to demand a general immigration policy. In fact, but for the fear of possible Japanese aggression, it is doubtful if immigration would have had any advocates at all in pre-war Australia. As it is, the number of immigrants has been small. Between 1910 and 1914 the net increase of population by immigration was not more than 300,000; during the same period over 5,000,000 immigrants entered the United States. The result has been not only the absolute exclusion of all colored peoples, but the practical limitation of immigration to settlers of British stock. It is estimated that 98 per cent of Australians are of British origin.

The events of the war and still more of the peace have profoundly affected the position of Australia. However much Australians may wish to hug their happy and prosperous isolation, they cannot shut their eyes to certain far-reaching and ominous changes in the world situation. The center of gravity in world politics is shifting visibly toward the Pacific Ocean. The British navy is no longer dominant and unchallenged on the seas. The Japanese Alliance—which was regarded by many Australians as a safeguard against Japanese aggression—has been replaced by the vaguer assurances of the Washington Conference. At the Peace Conference the Japanese delegate demanded—and almost obtained—the insertion in the Covenant of the League of Nations of a clause which would have meant the end of the White Australia Policy. In China and India also the rising tide of population threatens at any moment to slop over into less crowded countries. The collapse of Europe and the visible disintegration of her industrial mechanism mean that millions, not only on the Continent but in Great Britain also, will be forced to look elsewhere for the means of subsistence. Moreover, a change of policy on the part of the United States has partially closed another outlet for the great movement of world population which seems imminent. There is, in fact, every indication that Australia's isolation is nearing an end.

For the full realization of the new situation to sink into the consciousness of the Australian people will take time. But already there are some signs of a change of attitude. Gaps are beginning to appear in the Chinese wall of insularity. For the first time in Australian history there has been a popular if at present insignificant movement in favor of a progressive policy, which has enabled the state governments which control immigration to put forward a program. Even the Labor Party, which has consistently opposed all state-aided schemes, is now inclined to concentrate its energies less on opposition and more on insuring that colonization schemes shall be soundly planned and efficiently carried out. This changed attitude is no doubt largely due to the realization that a population of five and a half millions cannot expect to keep a vast continent to itself. But there is also, I believe, a stirring of the Australian conscience and a dawning conviction that Australia owes some obligations to the hapless workers of less prosperous countries. Unfortunately the immigration movement is at present controlled by reactionary bodies. All the governments of the states, except Queensland and South Australia, belong to the reactionary parties, while the speakers of the New Settlers' League—a semi-official body formed to agitate for a bold immigration policy—are apt to stress unduly the military and strategic arguments for increasing the population. The bogey of the yellow peril, which was exploited so successfully at the time of the institution of compulsory military training, is again raising its ugly head. This type of propaganda is not only exceedingly dangerous but it is also ineffective. Australians are supremely confident—perhaps overconfident—of their ability to defend their country against all comers, and they resent the resurrection of this ancient specter. Moreover, the regrettable inefficiency with which existing schemes are being handled is rapidly alienating public support. It is widely believed, and with some justification, that the present governments are far too tender to the large landowners. It is certain that there are thousands of native-born Australians, to say nothing of immigrants, who are unable to obtain land at a reasonable figure. Probably, therefore, the best hope of a real immigration policy for Australia lies in the advent of labor governments both in the Commonwealth and the states, which will probably not be long delayed. Even more significant than the change of attitude toward immigration is the awakening of the progressive minds of the Labor Party to the importance of the land question. During recent years the Labor Party has been almost entirely an industrial party, and this accounts for its attitude to immigration. But the power of the Australian Labor Party was originally based on the support of the small farmer, and today there are signs of a return to the old alliance between town and country worker. In Queensland, indeed, under the able leadership of the present Premier, Mr. Theodore, the alliance is already firmly knit and its results are seen in the progressive land policy of that Government. A similar alliance throughout Australia would mean the end of the big estates, a progressive settlement policy, and the consequent opening of the door to landsettlers from overseas.

It is possible to hope for a more liberal attitude on the part of Australian labor toward the immigration of Europeans, but there is no prospect of any modification of the White Australia Policy. It is, perhaps, something that the Australian Labor Party has announced its intention to summon a conference of Pacific labor to consider all questions which might disturb the peace of the Pacific. But that is merely a gesture. Not only labor but practically the whole of Australia is adamant in insisting on the absolute exclusion of all colored peoples. The White Australia Policy remains a sacred and unassailable dogma for the vast majority of Australians.

Russia, America, Japan

THE Moscow correspondent of the Japanese Osaka Mainichi, Mr. Fuse, in an interview with Leon Trotsky published in the Moscow press of April 24, asked the opinion of the Commissar of War of the USSR on a number of questions concerning the mutual relations between Russia, America, and Japan in connection with the latest political developments in the Far East and the adoption of the bill excluding Japanese from America. Following are Trotsky's answers in the order given:

1. You say that in 1920 V. I. Lenin told you in a personal conversation: "In spite of everything that is going on I look upon our future relations (with Japan) optimistically." Vladimir Ilyich certainly did not intend to express in these words his confidence in the good intentions of the Japanese Government in 1920. His statement evidently meant that the great Japanese people, in spite of the opposition of the reactionaries, would in the end succeed in attaining not only normal but also friendly relations with the Soviet Union. To this opinion I agree.

2. I do not think that the earthquake changed the imperialist character of the policies of the ruling classes of Japan. Imperialism depends upon the social structure of the state and not upon the geological structure of its territory. The earthquake signifies a temporary weakening of imperialism but not the liquidation of imperialism as a political method. A balancing force to oppose the imperialism could be created only through a thoroughgoing democratization of the social and political life of Japan.

3. You ask whether it may be supposed that the "historic lesson" of the last imperialist war will serve to prevent new wars. No, I do not think so. In the eyes of Utopians every war has been a salutary historic lesson. This, however, has never prevented the starting of new wars. The roots of wars in our epoch are in the capitalistic structure of society which breeds a clash of interests on the world arena. In divided Europe there are at present as many soldiers as on the eve of the last war. There is more sharp antagonism in Europe today than before the war.

The differences on the Pacific coast are also becoming sharper. Do I agree with those who consider a war between the United States and Japan impossible? No, in spite of all my desires in the matter, I cannot agree with this opinion. In the United States and Japan we have two mighty capitalist states possessing great armed forces and divided by many clashing interests. Do I think that a war between the two countries is unavoidable? No. This depends upon the force of opposition which the imperialist tendencies encounter within each of these countries.

Trotsky's concluding statement was made in reply to the following question of the Japanese correspondent.

4. QUESTION. In the opinion of considerable circles of Japanese society there exists between the USSR and Japan a community of interests not only in the field of economic but also in that of political relations, viz.: (a) Of all European Powers Russia would be the only one to support Japan in the question of racial equality in which Japan was unanimously defeated at the Versailles conference; (b) the Russian view of the liberation of the Eastern peoples from the yoke of Europe and America coincides with the slogan of the Japanese people 'Asia for the Asiatics'; (c) China, which is the neighbor of both the USSR and Japan and in the relations with which both countries are deeply interested, represents, owing to its unsettled internal situation, a country of various surprising possibilities which necessitates a coordinated Chinese policy on the part of the USSR and Japan. Do you attach any significance to this community of political interests in the establishment of the future relations between the Soviet Union and Japan?

TROTSKY. Yes. In so far as it is a matter of struggle against the disgusting and shameful tendency to treat the Japanese as a lower race, the Japanese people will find in the Soviet Union a steadfast and disinterested friend. The conception of higher and lower races is a reflection of the haughtiness of the ruling classes of old Europe during those centuries when Asia was still sound asleep. But all this has completely and finally gone back into history. Asia has awakened. And should Europe keep on degenerating for any length of time under the conditions created by the Versailles peace, then the center of gravity of the historic development will finally shift to America and Asia. In so far as the ruling classes of the United States are cultivating an unfriendly and insulting attitude toward the yellow race they are increasing the menace of new bloody conflicts on an immense scale.

You say that our slogan of the liberation of the peoples of the East coincides with the slogan of the Japanese people "Asia for the Asiatics." Yes, it coincides in so far as we are in vigorous opposition to the maintenance of the dominance and tyranny of European imperialism over the peoples of Asia. But it is plain that this does not mean that we would be willing to recognize the right of one Asiatic people to oppress and suppress another Asiatic people. No. Within Asia, liberated from European oppression, we also stand for the right of all nationalities to self-determination.

Position of the Industrial Bank

IN connection with the recent trial and conviction of A. Krasnoschokov, director of the Industrial Bank, described in an article by William Henry Chamberlin in The Nation for April 30, the following facts about the position of the bank published by the Rosta Service are of interest:

The yearly balance sheet for the financial year 1922-1923 shows that on October 1, 1923, the share capital of the bank amounted to 15,325,000 gold rubles. At the present time the paid-up capital amounts to 21,000,000 rubles, or with subscriptions about 25,000,000.

The net profit of the bank, after covering all expenses and taxation, and available for distribution to the shareholders, amounted to 2,050,000 gold rubles.

During the year the bank received on its current accounts 435,000,000 gold rubles, and paid out on these accounts 403,000,000. The bank actually succeeded in receiving 50 per cent to 65 per cent of all sums kept in current accounts by industrial undertakings in Moscow. During the year the Industrial Bank

Whose Culture?

Whose Democracy?

CULTURE AND DEMOCRACY IN THE UNITED STATES

by Horace M. Kallen

Is the future social organization of our country to be made up of the contributions of all its racial elements or only of one?—For the intelligent American of our time this book proposes a philosophy that is hopeful without illusion.

"Here, in a rarity is a genuine attempt at constructive criticism, based not upon empty wishing but upon sober confrontation of facts. His style is compact, plainly the outer semblance of a deeply pondered substance. His attitude which is essentially optimistic derives from a cultural democratism of which his own career is an embodiment. In one of the most significant sentences of the book, and incidentally one of the most pregnant verities that has latterly come to this writer's attention he hints a 'new freedom' perhaps undreamed of by the man who made the phrase."

—Christian Science Monitor.
"This book is a study in the group psychology of all the American people. The Klan, immigration, and the industrial age are carefully studied in a series of brilliant essays."
—St. Louis Star. $3.00

BONIE & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 48th STREET NEW YORK N.Y.

A limited number of copies now ready

John Brown, A Biography

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"Mr. Villard . . . has served humanity by making this record."—William Allen White in the Emporia Gazette.

"It at once becomes the standard, and probably final authority on its theme."—London Times.

"Mr. Villard's book is the labor of a master of men. His book is a great production."—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

"I can only say after reading from first to last its more than 700 pages that I have never encountered anything this side of Gibbon's 'Rome' which has made me feel more the personal power of a single work."—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

"Perhaps in thus dramatically fashioning his volume Mr. Villard obeyed an instinct rather than acted upon a preconceived plan; that is often the case with great work, where a writer's feelings are deeply enlisted. Be this as it may, the merit and charm are none the less; he has seized well a splendid opportunity and has written one of the great biographies of our literature."—John T. Morse, Jr., Editor of American Statesmen Series, in the Atlantic Monthly.

With many portraits and other illustrations.

In one volume, 8vo. 740 pages. Price $5.00; by mail prepaid, $5.26.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

4 Park Street

Boston, Mass.

paid out in loans (chiefly to industry) 158,000,000 gold rubles.

These very satisfactory figures at the end of the year have not in any way diminished in the new working year (1923-1924). In the period from October 1 to January 24 balance deposits increased from 32,000,000 to 50,000,000 gold rubles, while the indebtedness of the bank's clientele increased from 44,000,000 to 77,500,000 rubles.

Thus there is no question of the proceedings against Krasnoshokov in any way affecting the general well-being and progress of the Industrial Bank. In point of fact, the sums involved constituted only an insignificant percentage of the current expenditure and could not in any way seriously affect the bank's operations.

The Political Shift in Germany

THIS table gives the results of the three German elections held since the revolution—that for the Constituent Assembly in 1919, the general election for the Reichstag in 1920, and the recent general election held on May 4:

	1919		1920		1924
	Votes	Members	Votes	Members	Votes	Members
Communists			441,995	2	3,746,671	62
Socialists	10,566,552	185	10,508,769	193	6,014,380	100
Democratic Party	4,903,533	75	2,220,334	45	1,657,957	28
Centrum (Catholic)	5,241,493	89	4,540,830	68	3,920,798	65
Bavarian People's Party (Catholic)			1,171,722	21	946,649	16
German People's Party	1,343,140	23	3,606,316	62	2,640,484	45
Bavarian Peasants' Party	275,791	4	218,884	4	684,395	10
Guelphists (Hanover)	280,204	3	319,100	5	319,779	5
German Nationalists	2,549,721	42	3,736,778	66	5,778,313	95
Agricultural League					574,280	10
National Freedom Party (Fascist)					1,924,553	32
German Social Party (Fascist)					337,924	4
Other parties			65,219	0	1,842,405	0
Totals	25,100,834	421	25,829,947	466	29,388,588	472

* In 1920 the Majority Socialists polled 5,614,452 and won 112 seats, and the Independent Socialists polled 4,894,317 and won 81 seats. The two parties were reunited in September, 1922.

† Between the elections of 1919 and 1920 the Bavarian Catholics seceded from the Centrum and formed the Bavarian People's Party, which is monarchist and particularist.

‡ Fourteen parties.

Contributors to This Issue

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN, feminist, philosopher, writer, is the author of a new book, "His Religion and Hers."

IDA TREAT, who formerly taught Romance languages at Western Reserve University, has lived for five years in Paris.

ROBERT HERRICK, novelist and contributing editor of The Nation, has recently published a new book, "Waste."

CLINTON W. GILBERT, author of "The Mirrors of Washington," and Washington correspondent for a group of American newspapers, has recently returned from a trip to Russia.

BENJAMIN C. MARSH is managing director of the Farmers' National Council.

Just Published
The Stenographic Ad Verbatim Report of
THE INTERNATIONAL DEBATE OF THE DAY!
BERTRAND RUSSELL versus SCOTT NEARING
 Introduction by SAMUEL UNTERMYER
 Subject:
RESOLVED: That the Soviet Form of Government Is Applicable to Western Civilization.
 MR. RUSSELL, Negative MR. NEARING, Affirmative
 Held in New York City May 25, 1924
PRICE, $1.00 POSTPAID.
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
 500 FIFTH AVENUE Dept. N. NEW YORK

What do you think about an American Labor Party and the Tasks before It?

Come and join the discussions of the LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
 at Belmar, N. J., June 25-28

Among the leaders will be Robert Morss Lovett, George Soule, Morris Hillquit, Scott Nearing, Stuart Chase, Horace Kallen, Norman Thomas, Senator Shipstead (probably) and John Brophy.

Write for particulars to the L. I. D., 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City

COLLEGE ENTRANCE TUTORING CAMP

preparation for fall examinations of Barnard, Bryn Mawr, Mt. Holyoke, Radcliffe, Smith, Vassar, and Wellesley College—serious tutoring plus water sports and outdoor life—at the BRYN MAWR PREPARATORY TUTORING CAMP—eighth season—July 26th to September 20th. Under same management—

PHILLIPS LAKE CAMP FOR GIRLS

a recreation camp receiving two groups, juniors and seniors—season six weeks, beginning July 1st. For particulars and circulars, address AMY K. MACMASTER, EAST HOLDEN, MAINE

CO-OPERATIVE APARTMENTS

Group erecting elevator apartments on Andrews Avenue, block south of New York University.
 Children's Playground—Tennis Court—Permanent South, East and West exposures.

Subscriptions invited

Investment $475 per room. Rental $16 per room covers all expenses and 10% return on investment. Net average rental $14.40 per room. Paul Braude, 299 Madison Avenue, Vanderbilt 9431.

For a Library

"Our school library has been supplied most generously with a complimentary subscription to The Nation. We appreciate this favor more than we can express, since it is the only way in which we can obtain the magazine at present, and we find it quite indispensable."—A Seattle high school.

"Till now we have received The Nation as a gift and the National Bibliothek is not yet able to pay subscription out of her own means. . . . We attach great importance to the matter, the more as The Nation in our public periodical reading room is very much appreciated."

—A library in Vienna.

By means of the library fund which The Nation maintains through the generosity of its readers, these two subscriptions and a number of others have been renewed. Often the libraries and schools which make best use of The Nation, both abroad and in this country, cannot afford to pay for their own subscriptions. There is always a waiting list. Do any of our readers care to contribute?

THE NATION

Contributions to this fund will be applied either at wholesale rates (3 subscriptions for $11.50) or at regular rates, with book premiums to be chosen by the donor.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 18, 1924

No. 3076

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	698
EDITORIALS:
Coolidge	696
A Pretty Good Congress	697
A Sea Wolf's End	697
What Is Wrong with the Klan?	698
THE RACE PROBLEM IN THE CARIBBEAN:
I. The French Way. By Robert Herrick	699
A RUNAWAY CONGRESS. By Gilson Gardner	701
THE NEW EDUCATION:
I. In the Public Schools. By Agnes de Lima	702
CLEVELAND'S BEST MINDS. By Art Young	704
DEMOCRATIC INFANTRY. By William Hard	705
A HERETIC ON TRIAL. By Charles B. Driscoll	706
RENUNCIATION. By William A. Drake	707
A COMMUNICATION:
Sauce for Mr. Daugherty. By Arthur Garfield Hayes	707
THE NORDICS. By Arthur Guiterman	708
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	708
CORRESPONDENCE	709
BOOKS:
A Great Liberal Leader. By Herbert W. Horwill	711
Two Poets and a Novelist. By Mark Van Doren	711
Extra Muros. By Johan J. Smertenko	712
Shelley in France. By Theodore Stanton	712
Problems of Society. By A. D. Sheffield	713
A Layman in the Field of Art. By Alice Beal Parsons	714
Fascism. By Arthur Livingston	714
Books in Brief	715
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The German and French Elections. By Robert Dell	716
Europe's Reaction: I. The Attack on the Eight-hour Day. By Sylvia Kopald	717

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY IRITA VAN DOREN
MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE'S Wisconsin progressives are providing the only sparks of life that fly about the dull-est Republican convention within the memory of man, and the Coolidge henchmen seem determined to ignore them. Harry Daugherty is admitted as a respected delegate to the convention of Abraham Lincoln's party, and La Follette's supporters are treated as disreputable outsiders! Daugherty's latest act was in keeping with his past. After hiring two attorneys, one a former United States Senator, to represent him through three months of daily sessions of the Brookhart-Wheeler committee, after issuing almost daily complaints that he was not given opportunity to state his side of the story, he quit like a coward when the occasion came. He had been accused before the nation of collusion in crime, and shown as associating, while Attorney General, with the filthiest lot of plotters in America. Yet when the committee invited him to appear and defend himself he took refuge behind a technical decision that the committee had no power to compel witnesses to testify. Within a week of that sorry confession the Wisconsin men presented to the Cleveland convention their demand that the Republican Party disavow Harry Daugherty and Albert Fall—but as we go to press there is no indication that the Coolidge-ridden convention will even take the demand seriously.

EX-GOVERNOR LOWDEN of Illinois gives as his reason for declining to let his name be presented to the Republican National Convention for the vice-presidential nomination the belief that he can be more useful by continuing his work for certain farmers' organizations. There is more to it than that. Usually well-informed sources report that Mr. Lowden has been told that it would be political suicide for him to accept a place on the Coolidge ticket in view of the failure of the Administration to get through Congress any legislation for the relief of the farmers. With the death of the McNary-Haugen bill for the farmers and the Hoell-Barkley measure for the railroad workers, President Coolidge undoubtedly faces a formidable defection among both country and city workers that are normally Republican. Farmer resentment, it is reported, will be voiced at the next session of Congress in a demand for revising the tariff downward. This is as it should be. The Nation has already said that the farmers are as much entitled to the McNary-Haugen bill as the manufacturers and merchants were to the Fordney-McCumber tariff, but true statesmanship calls for the repeal of the latter measure, not for an extension of special favors and artificial respiration at the expense of the consumer. To pass the McNary-Haugen bill would be merely to pyramid the crash.

AFTER A LONG and futile effort to legislate against child labor under our present Constitution, the sponsors of the movement have induced Congress to accept and pass on to the State legislatures for ratification an amendment to our fundamental law, reading as follows:

Section 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age.

Sec. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress.

The proposed amendment was accepted by the Senate on June 2 by a vote of 61 to 23. The House had voted its approval, 297 to 69, on April 26. Thus the campaign is now transferred to the State legislatures, a required three-fourths of which ought shortly to rally to the support of this measure of elementary humanity and justice. The proposed amendment is permissive rather than mandatory, making Congress at all times the judge of what regulative laws should be put in force. In some States the elimination of child labor will come hard—as did that of slavery—but it is just these regions that will profit most by the civilizing processes which the change will release.

AMRITSAR IS A WORD that has become a symbol of shame for the British Empire. On June 13, 1919, Brigadier General Dyer entered an inclosure at Amritsar where 10,000 Hindus were meeting despite his prohibition of assemblies. Without giving any warning or notice to disperse he ordered his troops to fire on the unarmed crowd which was peacefully listening to an address. He continued the fire for ten minutes; his men fired 1,650 rounds, "the fire being directed on crowds, not on individuals, and re-directed from time to time where the crowds were thickest." On the conclusion of the firing he and his troops retired, leaving the wounded unattended, and three hundred and seventy-nine persons dead. Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, officially approved General Dyer's action. After an interval and a protracted inquiry, the Indian Government removed General Dyer from his command in India, and General O'Dwyer was censured. At home, however, a group of irrepressible Tories made Dyer and O'Dwyer heroes. The Morning Post raised £26,300 for Dyer. Nor are Dyer and O'Dwyer ashamed of their butchery today. General O'Dwyer had the impudence to bring a libel suit against Sir Sankaran Nair for statements about Amritsar made in his book, "Gandhi and Anarchy." A British judge, after hearing testimony, dared to express his view that General Dyer "acted rightly" and was "wrongly punished"; and a British jury awarded General O'Dwyer a verdict of £500 and costs—more than £15,000. Such a blessing upon the massacre at Amritsar makes the word more than ever a kind of stench in the world's nostrils. When will Anglo-Saxons learn that they have no divine right to murder other races?

OUR BIG-NAVY MEN are sure that the United States alone can be trusted with the biggest navy in the world, and that no one else should be permitted one as big. Doubtless Japan's admirals believe, as Germany's did and England's do, that the peace of the world will be safe only when they have undisputed supremacy of the seas. It is a human failing to forget Haiti and Amritsar and to think oneself a little wiser, a little more pacific, than others. But we hardly expected from the venerable Manchester Guardian, usually the custodian of a ripe philosophic wisdom, such comment as this:

Clearly the Government ought to secure for British use Mr. Grindell-Mathews's secret "death ray." . . . We make bold to think that no other great nation in Europe now detests war quite so heartily as England does. None, therefore, is so fit to be invested with an instrument which would appear, if it comes off, to be the natural weapon of peaceable people for the temporary disablement of the aggressive.

No people, as a people, can be trusted more than another to detest war in a crisis, or to act decently toward weaker peoples.

STABILIZATION OF THE MARK in the early part of this year gave the German workers a ledge of financial security. From this perch the Ruhr miners are now attempting to win back the gains realized by the revolution and lost during the following period of unemployment and overnight depreciation of wages. The strike began with a small group of miners who requested a 30 per cent increase in wages and spread until about 90 per cent of the men had stopped work. Even the highly conservative Catholic trade unions after much hesitation joined the strikers. The dispute finally crystallized around the question of hours, and now the appeals in the labor papers call it a defense of the cultural life of the German worker. The miners are demanding seven- and seven-and-a-half-hour shifts (underground) instead of the present eight- and eight-and-a-half-hour shifts, which make a working day of about nine and a half hours. The surface workers have been working ten hours, which is slightly less than in 1913. Undoubtedly if the miners win there will be attempts in other industries throughout Germany to get back to the eight-hour-day basis.

ABANDONMENT OF THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY was only one of many repressive measures instituted by the employers, often in the name of reparations or the great need of the fatherland. Whatever its outcome, this strike is another of the long string of proofs that the heaviest burden of reparations payment cannot carelessly be thrown on the workers' shoulders. The German workers through their representatives on the governing body of the International Labor Office have said that they would do everything possible to expedite the payment of reparations. But they will hardly sit docilely by and see their standard of living lowered without assurance that their sacrifices are accomplishing something or that they will get back their shorter working day when the emergency is passed. The "Micun" agreements between the German and French employers have given body to this fear and according to the Manchester Guardian are largely responsible for the present dangerous conflict. The swelling of the Communist ranks in the Ruhr is an indication of this determination of the German worker not to go into the industrial trenches unless the employer is by his side.

WE MUST RECALL again the tragedy of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, who stand convicted of murder. We believe that the evidence did not establish their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt—as the law requires—and that they would not have been condemned except for the hysterical opposition to radicals and aliens that was at its height when the men were tried at Dedham, Massachusetts, nearly three years ago. Since then the reasonable doubt in their favor has increased. Two of the State's witnesses gave testimony at the trial wholly differing from that in preliminary statements. Since then both have repudiated their testimony at the trial—and then reaffirmed it! More important, perhaps, it has become known that cartridges not introduced as exhibits at the trial were passed around in the jury room, thus violating the legal right of the defendants to be confronted with all the evidence against them. Also one of the two experts on firearms whom the prosecution put on the stand has stated that his views were misinterpreted to the jury because of the district attorney's avoidance of questions that would have brought out the truth. A decision on the application for a new trial is expected shortly. Whatever it is, a heavy moral and financial burden will be placed upon the Sacco-Vanzetti New Trial League, 43 Tremont Street, Boston; for if the decision is favorable to the men the expense of a new trial will have to be met, while if adverse another application must be made to a higher court.

A DISSOLUTION of the Republican and the Democratic parties was recently proposed by Frank A. Munsey in favor of a new grouping that would place conservatives against liberals, thus recognizing the real political issue in present-day America. Porto Rico has just beaten the United States to it. The historic parties were the Unionists and the Republicans, both run in the interest of property holders and largely indifferent to the bitter need of the great body of impoverished and exploited workers. There was this difference, though, that the Unionists espoused independence for the island while the Republicans championed statehood. Owing to failing strength, the Republicans had formed a working arrangement with the new and rapidly growing Socialist Party, whose leader, Senator Iglesias, is also the head of the American Federation of Labor of Porto Rico. Last winter all parties came to an agreement in regard to the political future of the island to the extent of sending a commission to Washington to ask neither for independence nor statehood but a high degree of autonomy. In Washington a number of persons, notably John W. Weeks—who was a banker before he became Secretary of War—let the commission know that they didn't like the spread of socialism in Porto Rico and the island would get better pickings if it put the brakes on. When the commission returned to Porto Rico the heads of the Unionists and of the Republicans proposed an alliance which has now been ratified by party conventions, while the Socialists have been excommunicated and excoriated and Big Chief Gompers has been asked to depose Mr. Iglesias as guardian of the A. F. of L. wigwam in Porto Rico.

NO ITEM IN THE BRITISH King's-birthday honors list will be more popular than the privy councilorship conferred upon T. P. O'Connor, the "father" of the House of Commons. It is much more than a well-deserved tribute to a man whose personal qualities have won for him the affection of a host of friends both in Parliament and in London journalism. It is especially significant as a picturesque evidence of the reconciliation of Great Britain with Irish Nationalism. For a long period the representatives of the Home Rule Party at Westminster were debarred, however conspicuous their merits, from any recognition at the hands of the sovereign. An English, Scotch, Welsh, or Irish Conservative or Liberal who entered public life could always cherish the ambition of some day sitting in the Cabinet or of gaining one of the many titles that sweeten the toil of a politician across the Atlantic. But for an Irish Nationalist the "fountain of honor" was always dry. Not for him were the peerages or privy councilorships, the baronetcies or knighthoods to which an Ulster Tory with not a tithe of his brains or character might reasonably aspire. But at last the embargo has been removed. It is, indeed, reported that "Tay Pay" was offered a peerage, but preferred to accept instead a distinction which leaves him still Mr. O'Connor. With Tim Healy at Dublin Castle as the representative of the Crown and the name of T. P. O'Connor on the roll of His Majesty's privy council it is clear that to have fought strenuously for the rights of Ireland is no longer to have placed oneself outside the pale.

RESOLUTIONS CALLING for the retirement of Wallace W. Atwood from the presidency of Clark University have been signed by a group of Eastern alumni comprising members of the faculties of Harvard, Cornell, Brown, and Syracuse universities, the universities of Maine and of South Carolina, and Wellesley and Barnard colleges. The resolutions are similar to those previously drawn up by a group of alumni on the Pacific Coast, by the Washington Alumni Club, and by the 1923 graduating class at Clark. Attention is called to the fact that Clark University, under the Atwood regime, has lost some of its best teachers, has suffered a loss of academic reputation, and has been unable to maintain the confidence of faculty, students, or general public. These things are only too true despite the vote of confidence which was passed by the student body on June 9. It is clear that those who have the reputation and ideals of Clark University most at heart do not intend to give up the movement which was brought to a head when Scott Nearing's talk before an undergraduate organization was stopped by Mr. Atwood two years ago. The trustees will hardly be moved by protests not backed by money, but Mr. Atwood himself ought not to be so thick-skinned as to fail to realize that he would have greater usefulness elsewhere.

ANYHOW, VASSAR COLLEGE had its daisy chain, which is much to be thankful for in a world where everything is not always quite right. Some whom the political conventions failed to thrill, and who have been only mildly concerned with the fate of the Dawes Report, were genuinely perturbed over the possible failure of that daisy chain to materialize. Only about a week before the class-day exercises, newspaper dispatches from Poughkeepsie reported that owing to the lateness of the season not a daisy was in sight. What was to be done? Must the famous rite in which the seniors walk between a chain of daisies carried by the twenty most beautiful sophomores be abandoned? It would have been close to sacrilege to import the flowers which, according to tradition, had always been gathered from home fields. Everything went right after all. The dispatches sent on class day tell us that daisies burst miraculously into blossom just in time, and in due season the rotogravure sections will show us the seniors, the twenty most beautiful sophomores, the flowery chain, and all. So all is well, and we can enjoy without any reservations this late spring of 1924, a typical English spring in its cool, slow evolution, a spring in which the tender yellow greens of early May are still unspoiled in June.

PRINCE ALEXANDER VON HOHENLOHE, whose death is reported from a small town in Switzerland, was a son of the von Hohenlohe who succeeded Bismarck. The elder Hohenlohe was truly a statesman, something that can hardly be said of his successors as imperial chancellor. His son was of that noble band in all countries who refused to bow down before the war god. He was a pacifist; he stuck to his guns and wrote and talked against the Kaiser's war policy. Naturally, the mob turned upon him. He lost all of his properties during the war, and, for years a crippled invalid, died actually in want, dependent upon the gifts of sympathizers in America and elsewhere. Naturally, the average German newspaper has spoken of him in the tone which the English press used about Ramsay MacDonald in the early war days. But Alexander von Hohenlohe was eternally right, and part of the fury against him was doubtless due to the march of events confirming the correctness of his positions and of many of his prophesies. In that heaven in which there are no wars he will surely rest in peace. In France, too, a noted disciple of peace, Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, has passed away. Of an engaging personality and long devotion to the cause, he labored incessantly for peace on earth—through the Hague conferences and international agreements—until the war came. Then he was swept away by the tide in his own country. He was a fine and gallant figure and he will be missed and remembered with gratitude whenever there are international gatherings to work for the noblest of all ideals.

Coolidge

AN amazing, an almost inexplicable political phenomenon is the nomination of President Coolidge, which is to take place as this issue of The Nation is mailed to its readers. The greatest gift the Republican Party has to bestow goes almost by default in a convention which will surely be the dulllest and drabbest in the history of the party. One must turn back to the renomination of President Harrison in 1892 for a parallel, and even that is far from exact. For one thing, there has perhaps never been such wide divergence of public opinion about any man as about Mr. Coolidge. In 1884, it is true, the party was divided into two camps as to the honesty, or dishonesty, of James G. Blaine. But even his defenders admitted that some of his business transactions had been regrettably careless. Today the two schools of opinion about Calvin Coolidge are so remote in their points of view that it is as if they spoke different languages. In wide circles the belief exists that as Providence raised up George Washington at the birth of the nation and Abraham Lincoln at the hour when its dissolution threatened, so now in this time of social crisis it has in its infinite wisdom supplied Calvin Coolidge to pilot the ship of state into safe waters. To such as these Wilson and Roosevelt pale beside the man from Massachusetts. Everywhere business men believe that Mr. Coolidge is their savior. They think that he has shown sterling courage and ability; that to a most desirable reticence he has added political fearlessness, a determination to safeguard the finances of the nation, to make life easier for the moneyed man; that he has set his face like flint against any and all who would advocate political or social change.

When to such as these there comes a dissenter who declares that Mr. Coolidge is conspicuously unfit for the Presidency, that he is without the ability or the principle needed in this emergency, they can only stare and shake their heads and wonder if the dissenter is really in his right mind. Has not, they ask, the party been united in favoring the nomination of Mr. Coolidge? Is it not true that he has been so obviously the right man in the right place that no opposition has been able to make headway against him? Has he not stood for economy in expenditure, retrenchment, opposition to each and every raid upon the Treasury? Has he not been sagacious and statesmanlike in his utterances? Is it not perfectly plain that the bulk of the people want such a tried and trusted man in the White House? To the Democrats these persons point with pitying scorn because they cannot agree upon a man. It is characteristic, they think, of the best in the old Republican Party that it knows its own mind so clearly in advance of its convention.

Indeed, so remarkably has the Coolidge propaganda been "put over" that multitudes do not even know that there are critics and dissenters. The American people dearly love to be fooled, to worship politicians of whom they have created portraits which bear little or no resemblance to the originals. For a brief hour there was the Admiral Dewey myth. The Roosevelt myth is still securely lodged in many minds, and the Wilson myth is similarly intrenched with thousands who insist upon having him as their hero and who close eyes and ears to facts which would compel them to revise their judgments. The Harding myth has all but disappeared under the revelations of the crookedness with which he was surrounded; it is hard to worship a man and to build a million-dollar memorial to him when you see that he has been surrounded by precious rascals of his own choosing. The Coolidge myth has been created by amazingly skilful propaganda, as a result of which the Boston police-strike falsehood is still believed, and a character has been created for the President which bears no relation to the man in the White House. From our observation, Mr. Coolidge, as President, has merited praise only for the mild courage of his vetoes, and there he followed the wishes of those whose support he deems essential to his success. He was willing to offend the veterans by vetoing the bonus because his real masters, the large business interests of the country, were opposed to that bonus. It was not difficult for him to disappoint the expectations of the postal clerks for a needed readjustment of their wage scale, because the business interests are demanding economy in expenditure and the reduction of taxation. He did not dare veto the tax bill or the infamous immigration bill. Ask any Coolidge business man why he favors the President and the invariable reply is: He opposed the bonus and he wishes to reduce the surtaxes. Business favors Mellon and Coolidge against all comers. If you ask what else the President has done, the reply is that nothing else was needed. If you demand to know why Mr. Coolidge has not been a flaming angel of retribution for the offenders in the scandals which have shaken the country and dishonored it both at home and abroad as never before, the average business man replies that it is a fine thing that he set his face against the muckraking of Congress.

Under these circumstances editors can merely set down their honest and sincere opinions about the man and let others decide for themselves what they think. We believe it fitting that Mr. Coolidge should lead the Republican Party in 1924 because it is more than ever before the creature of the big-business interests, of which he is so happy a servant. We record our opinion that he has been, like Mr. Harding, a willing associate of the worst crooks that ever got into our political life; that he has denounced them not at all; that he has connived at the use of the several departments of the government to destroy the reputations of those bent on revealing corruption; that he is a narrow, petty-minded, half-educated politician, who plays with some skill the political game as it has been developed in small New England towns. We believe him to be without vision, without leadership, without a vestige of statesmanship. Indeed, we are almost tempted to wish for his reelection that in the coming four years when he would have to stand on his own merits he might demonstrate even to the dulllest of his dupes his inadequacy and his unfitness. Whether that shall come to pass is on the laps of the gods. The truth is that the politicians themselves are under no illusions; they do not love Coolidge; they are neither inspired nor made enthusiastic by him. They are renominating him because their party is so far gone in corruption, in its servitude to the holders of special privilege, that it lacks the force or the power to rouse itself, to clean house, to purge its temples of the money-changers, and to demand an upright and consecrated leadership.

A Pretty Good Congress

FEW sessions of Congress will be as well remembered as that which has just ended. It passed few bills of exceptional excellence; it passed some of exceptional poorness; it neglected many issues that required attention; but it will be remembered for its investigations. The fact that the senators dug searchingly into the conduct of the executive departments and unearthed a mass of festering corruption is chiefly responsible for the fact that the newspapers of the country, with a few notable exceptions, have been denouncing Congress in such bitter terms. It was by no means a do-nothing Congress; it was certainly not a subservient Congress; and it achieved some things which will long be remembered gratefully.

When there is rottenness in the seat of government it is no pleasant task to dig it out. The Administration holds all the cards. When Representatives Keller and Woodruff attacked Mr. Daugherty's administration of the Department of Justice two years ago, that malodorous individual succeeded in turning the impeachment proceedings against himself into an attack upon the representatives. This year Senator Wheeler broke through Daugherty's defenses and forced him out of office. If Wheeler had had the support from the Executive which he had from the Senate the ex-Attorney General might now be in jail, where he belongs. Senator Walsh's patient research finally brought out the fact that Mr. Harding's Secretary of the Interior had accepted $100,000 in a satchel from the oil magnate to whom he had delivered the nation's oil, and although Mr. Fall is not yet in prison the oil may be saved, and the officials primarily responsible for the transfer have been put out of the government service. Such achievements, while not legislative, are none the less memorable. Those who uncover corruption deserve praise, not those who conceal it, despite the curious campaign to discredit the investigation which both parties seem to have sponsored.

Legislatively this Congress has a mixed record. It passed the bonus bill and the pension grab enthusiastically. It passed an immigration bill which made notable improvements in the administration of the percentage-restriction system, but which established an even more intolerant basis of exclusion than the old, and also included the totally unnecessary slap at Japan which is already bearing fruit in ill feeling on the other side of the Pacific. American citizens are being made uncomfortable in Japan, as Japanese have been made uncomfortable in this country; and Congress is to blame. Upon these issues we believe that Congress was further from wisdom than the President.

In other matters Congress has a better record. While the new tax bill is not a scientific measure it seems to us an improvement over the Mellon plan, which relieved the big taxpayers disproportionately to the small. Here Congress overrode stiff executive opposition. Unfortunately it failed to give the necessary two-thirds majority to the amendment abolishing tax-exempt securities, which would end an important avenue of escape for large taxpayers. It did, however, pass the child-labor amendment, which now goes to the State legislatures for ratification. It voted a well-earned increase in salaries to the postal employees, which the President vetoed. The lower house approved the gift of Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford, but Senator Norris's analysis and exposure of its indefensible provisions kept it from indorsement by the Senate.

Certain issues were buried or allowed to die. No appropriation was made for German relief, because Senator Lodge blocked every proposal in committee. Nothing whatever was done for the relief of the farmers; and the attempt to reform the Esch-Cummins railroad act died. In both these fields a group of Western congressmen strove to force action; Old Guard opposition from both sides of the party line kept Congress from action. The World Court issue was also smothered in committee; the insincere substitutes of Senators Lodge and Pepper effectively stifled serious discussion of the question. Fortunately, the naval increase lost out in the final jam.

It is not a brilliant record, but for a preelection session it is pretty good. The progressive bloc held the balance of power in both houses, but it was not strong enough to initiate legislation of its own; it could and did kill the hope of thoroughly reactionary legislation. And the very presence on the floor of both houses of a little group of determined men silenced every attempt to stifle the investigations which exposed the rotten character of the Harding-Coolidge administrations. Congress did force a housecleaning, even if the job has not yet been completed. And that is more than most Congresses achieve.

A Sea Wolf's End

HOW many persons, we wonder, understood—if indeed they saw—a stray item in the newspapers the other day, saying that the steamship Von Steuben of the United States Shipping Board had been taken to Baltimore to be reduced to junk? Among sailors there is an old superstition against changing the name of a ship—a belief that it brings the vessel bad luck. What a pity that landlubbers, too, do not hold to such a superstition! One of the many wastes of the Shipping Board has been that of good names. It gives a vessel a name almost as often as a fresh coat of paint, thus obscuring the reputation and the history of many a fine ship.

For the Shipping Board's Von Steuben was none other than the famous Kronprinz Wilhelm, once one of the crack transatlantic liners of the North German Lloyd and later one of the most dreaded sea wolves of the World War. The Kronprinz Wilhelm was one of four express steamers to which Germany chiefly owes the supremacy in the transatlantic passenger service which she enjoyed for about the first ten years of this century. The others of the quartet were the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, the Kaiser Wilhelm II, and the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. Fleet, powerful, and luxurious, these twin-screwed, four-funneled beauties maintained together the fastest service across the Atlantic for at least a decade. It was to blast this reputation and regain its old rule of the waves that Great Britain subsidized the Cunard Line to build the giant racers Lusitania and Mauretania. The departure from or the arrival at the piers in Hoboken of any one of these celebrated German liners was almost an international event. In turn, the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and the Kaiser Wilhelm II each lowered the record for the transatlantic passage. For many years the only competitor in speed of the famous quartet was the flying Deutschland of the Hamburg-American Line.

"Sic transit gloria mundi!" What has become of these splendid ships of twenty years ago? The Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which sailors unkindly nicknamed "Rolling Billy" because of its bad habits in rough water, became a raider in 1914, and after a short career was caught and sent to the bottom by the British navy. The Kaiser Wilhelm II and the Kronprinzessin Cecilie were interned in this country during the first years of the war. When America entered the combat the Kaiser Wilhelm II became the transport Agamemnon and the Kronprinzessin Cecilie the Mount Vernon. Both are still afloat, but although they have barely reached respectable middle age they are no longer talked of, no longer sought after by the traveling public. The first is laid up in New York and the other in Boston. Their youthful prowess, the heyday of their fame, is forgotten.

But of all the quartet the Kronprinz Wilhelm had the most varied and adventurous history. Like the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, it, too, became a raider at the outbreak of the war, and with better luck it kept out of the clutches of His Majesty's navy. Early in January, 1915, some 100 French and English sailors were landed at the Canary Islands, bearing tales of the sinking of their ships by the German corsair. In February some 250 sailors reached American ports with similar tales, but in April the Kronprinz Wilhelm itself crept into the harbor of Newport News, disabled. The commander asked for, and received, fifteen days in which to make repairs. Meanwhile British and French war ships gathered at the three-mile line outside the harbor. A sensation-loving public awaited a battle or a miraculous escape by night. Neither happened. When the allotted time was up, the commander submitted to the internment of his ship and its crew.

Now the Kronprinz Wilhelm, famous express steamer and celebrated sea raider, has made its last port. It is going back to the melting-pot from which it came.

What Is Wrong with the Klan?

EARL MAYFIELD, Ku Klux Klan candidate for United States Senator from Texas, apparently is to retain his seat in the Senate. Ed Jackson, Ku Klux Klan candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Indiana, won the primary election in that State, hands down. Klan candidates have won local elections in Ohio, and the New York State delegation to the Republican convention at Cleveland is reported to be opposed to a stringent anti-Klan plank in the Republican platform. Oregon has a Klan governor, and in Georgia and other Southern States the Klan dominates the courts. What is behind this Klan which builds fiery crosses in every State of the Union, which dominates elections, and sways millions?

The New York World, which has been waging a vigorous campaign against the Klan, has conducted an interesting poll of Democrats and Republicans on the question whether the political conventions should go on record against "all groups, open or secret, which attempt to take the law into their own hands;" against prejudice or discrimination on account of race, color, or creed; and, specifically, against the Ku Klux Klan. The answers are various; most of the politicians declare in vague, general terms against race prejudice but prefer to avoid mention of the word "Klan." The most pithy comes from the Republican national committeeman from Oklahoma, Jim A. Harris. "All this hullabaloo about the Klan and the anti-Klan," says Mr. Harris, "reminds me of a statement once made by Josh Billings: 'Thur hez bin a heep sed consarnin' the wether, but nuthin' hes ever bin dun about it yet.'"

There has been too much said about the Klan, and too little done about Klannishness. The organization is not as important as its spirit. As the Klan has spread through the North and entered politics it has acquired an increasing restraint without changing its inner nature. The atrocities with which the early history of the Klan was punctuated seem to have been declining while the bitter, intolerant spirit of the Klan has been spreading. To kill the organization today would mean little if its spirit persisted.

Klannishness is not confined to the Klan. At Hicksville, Long Island, the Knights of Columbus were in charge this year of the Memorial Day exercises. As it happened, the three sons of Hicksville who had died in the World War were all Catholics. When the paraders reached the monument they found a wreath at its base, marked "K. K. K.," and were unwilling to leave it there. A fist fight followed, in which the wreath was stamped on and destroyed. The incident is trifling, but it marked another triumph for Klannishness. The wreath may have been intended as an insult, but a decent respect for the dead men and for the inclusiveness of their country would have let it lie untouched. There are good men in the Klan, although it can hardly be said that there are tolerant men; but they will never be converted to a decent respect for their fellow-countrymen if these others adopt the Klan's own intolerance.

To assume that all Klansmen are reprobates is to adopt the habit of mind exemplified in the ridiculous campaign posters distributed by the Klan in Indiana, reading:

Every criminal, every gambler, every thug, every libertine, every girl-ruiner, every home-wrecker, every wife-beater, every dope-peddler, every moonshiner, every crooked politician, every pagan Papist priest, every shyster lawyer, every K. of C., every white slaver, every brothel madam, every Rome-controlled newspaper, every black-spider—is fighting the Klan. Think it over. Which side are you on?

Well, we are on the side of those who fight Klannishness, although sometimes the fight against the Klan seems to borrow its evils. We are against those who assume that every Catholic is bad, or that every Klansman is bad; that every Jew is an outcast, or that every Gentile has a right to be called a Christian; that every Jap should be barred from the land or that every American is better than any foreigner. It will certainly help if the Klan is forced into the open—made to unmask, and to act, when it acts, publicly. It might help if it were proved that Mayfield was elected to the Senate by Klan money and that some of the officials who collected the money knew of crimes committed by Klansmen—but the country, which has heard of Mr. Daugherty and knows that the Republican Governor of Indiana has been sent to jail for fraud would not be much impressed. The Klan has invented no new crimes. Anti-Catholic sentiment is an old story in American political life; it had its greatest success in the fifties and was active again in the nineties. The Klan has revived an old intolerance, which will still be an evil when the passions now stirred by the three K's have been forgotten. The fight against the Klan will make most headway when it abandons personalities and vague principles. The worst sample of Klannishness in recent American history was the immigration law, and with that, as far as we know, the Ku Klux Klan had nothing to do.

The Race Problem in the Caribbean

By ROBERT HERRICK

II. The French Way

(In a previous article, printed in The Nation of June 11, Mr. Herrick described the situation existing in the British islands.)

IT is only sixty miles from the English island of St. Lucia to Martinique, less than forty miles from Martinique to the English island of Dominica. Both these British islands retain positive indications of French influence, distinguishing them from Barbados or Antigua, which are purely English. The colored population of St. Lucia and Dominica understand and largely use among themselves a French patois and their folk literature betrays the contacts they have had with their immediate neighbors. Moreover, there are subtler marks of French blood and French influence among many of the natives who have been under English rule exclusively for more than a century, testifying to the potent quality of the French culture. Yet when one passes in the night from one of these English islands to Martinique he wakes up to a new world, still predominantly colored, but with a vivid contrast in appearance and spirit that seems more marvelous the longer he remains in the French colonies. From the same materials, practically, physiographically, and racially, the French have made an utterly different compound culturally, which promises if permitted to endure to differentiate itself more and more from the English product.

I felt it that first Sunday morning of my visit to Martinique while taking my early coffee on the terrace of the hotel and watching the stream of colored folk on their way to mass in the cathedral. Color was the first note of contrast with the English settlements—color in the houses, in the costumes of the women, in the vivid madras, the picturesque foulards—I had never seen such amazing contrasts of color in dress. Purples and greens and yellows, all violently yet agreeably thrown together. And color in the people themselves. Here was not a people of whites and blacks (or even mulattoes). These women and children—for there were few men in the church-going crowd—were of every possible shade of brown, ivory, reddish bronze, yellow. Few were either dull or vivid black, as in Barbados and Trinidad. At this first glance it was evident the mixing of races had gone on in Martinique for a much longer time and more commonly than in any English island. Further acquaintance with conditions in the French islands confirmed this impression: of the one hundred and seventy-five thousand inhabitants of Martinique not more than two thousand are pure white, and an astonishingly small percentage of the majority are pure black, or nègres, as they are called. The great majority of the one hundred and seventy-five thousand have some white (a few, Indian) blood. Here, then, on a small scale, one might observe the results of an almost free miscegenation between whites and blacks and, if true, witness the dire degeneration that such a miscegenation is supposed to produce!

It is a commonplace that the French (and Southern Europeans generally) evince no such instinctive repugnance to the black race as the Anglo-Saxon; they intermarry with colored peoples and admit them quite freely to civil equality, even to a sort of social equality. The French colonials, during the days of slavery, endeavored unsuccessfully to keep the white stock pure by making stringent laws against the freeing of black women for the purpose of marriage, but to how little avail the sight of the present highly varied colored population is evidence. The fact was that the French colonial in those illicit relations with dark women which all colonial societies have suffered was much kinder, more humane, more open, and less ashamed of his irregular establishments than his English neighbors. For example, in the old days it was customary for the white man to give land or houses to his colored mistress, to admit the relationship. As a consequence one finds that today the colored offspring of miscegenation will speak with pride of his white father or grandfather. Instead of becoming neither a good white nor a good black, as the American has it, the French mixed blood is conscious of a superiority, and whether due to a real improvement of stock or to the benefit of a better upbringing, the lightly colored folk are the ones to be found in responsible positions, in trade and in the civil service. In fact if there is ever a race conflict in the French islands it will come about because of competition for control between the pure blacks, the plantation hands, who are less advanced, and the mixed breed who are socially conscious and ambitious—not between the white and the black. For here, as in the English Antilles, the white has already practically given over the hopeless struggle for racial dominance. Their numbers are falling every decade, and their wealth.

But it is not only by a franker mixing with the "inferior race" that the French colonial has brought about this situation, so different from that of the English colonies. Something besides the touch of white blood has gone to creating the allure, the grace, the subtle sense of independence, of quick-witted equality, all of which and more make the French colored man, woman, or child a different creature from the English colored. That superb carriage of the body, which Lafcadio Hearn was never weary of remarking thirty-five years ago, and which, especially among the colored women of Martinique, is as true today as then, that readiness of tongue and readiness of wit come from something other than mingling of blood. Across the tiny place from my hotel in the Fort de France was the Palais de Justice, with the usual flamboyant Gallic proclamation of Liberté, Égalité et Fraternité. These noble human ideals are probably no better observed in these distant dependencies of France than in Algiers or Tonquin—or Paris, for that matter. But that extravagant motto, for all its absurdity, splashed as it is across the façades of all French buildings, has put something into the French democracy which every other democracy in the world lacks. Just as the French conscript army seemed to me the most democratic army in the world, the most citizen army (probably far more so than the communist army) so the French colored folk carry themselves as do no other Negro people I have ever seen. There is no servility (and little insolence) in their attitude, but a consciousness of freedom and equality. This, with their vivid sense of color, with their charm, and their very great personal beauty makes them the most attractive colored people I have known in the world. Here for the first time I at least came to realize that it was stupid to speak of black or colored, indiscriminately en masse; that there was as great physical and personal individuality, as many shades of complexion and casts of features and degrees of beauty or charm among dark-skinned people as among Nordics! It is only the stupid—and brutal—egotism of a dominant race that lumps under one indiscriminated heading all the qualities of another race. Individuality and variety are not merely potentially but actually existent in black as in white. These the French culture has evoked.

Two obvious agencies have assisted in creating the French colored civilization—the Catholic church and the public schools. The French colonies are saturated with Catholicism. Not even in Brittany is the wayside shrine, the wayside cross, the calvaire as common as in Martinique. And whatever else one may find to say about Catholicism it inculcates in its lowliest representatives a spirit of Christian equality. The old white priest standing beneath the stone cross on the green hillside of Morne Rouge, surrounded by his black congregation who had made with him, singing, the stations of the cross that Lenten Sunday of March called them “mes frères” in his simple address, in no Pickwickian sense. So, too, the schools are crowded, where the youth are taught by white and colored men and women; taught at least to read and write French, so that practically every person in the colony can speak intelligible French, aside from the patois, which is unfortunately destined to die out. Possibly the Great War has had its part in this making of a French colored civilization. For somewhere in every hamlet there is a tablet bearing the names of many colored citizens who died in France fighting side by side with white Frenchmen. An extraordinary number of these colored men went overseas to fight. In the little hamlet of Lorain I counted over a hundred names on the memorial tablet of those who had died in the war. (Such strange names, too, suggesting Carib descent, African, East Indian coolie, Spanish and Portuguese, beside “Creole,” that is white colonial.)

Another important question, of course, is the land question. Wherever in these tropical islands the “inferior race” has been able to get hold of land in sufficient amount to live off it, the social product differs from that in places where, as in Barbados, the land is still held in the form of large plantations to be exploited by dependent blacks at a low wage. In the French islands the land is in small patches, no doubt largely because of the tumbled, broken, volcanic nature of the country. There are comparatively few large holdings. The characteristic thing in Martinique is the small cabin with a field of two, worked—and really worked—by the owner and his family. Of course this development is deplored by the white colonial who finds that it restricts his supply of labor, and who grumbles inevitably at the “lazy nigger.” And paradoxically in these densely populated islands there is an almost universal “labor problem.” But looking at the matter solely from the aspect of the colored colonial the small-holding type of development makes for independence, and charm, also cheapness of living. The by-ways of Martinique, the little valleys, the mountain slopes, are garden patches, supporting an animated, fairly industrious, vivid, and articulate colored race.

The first question the American traveler is asked in Martinique by both white and colored, asked with curiosity and agitation, is: “What is your country going to do with us? Will the United States take the French Antilles in payment of war debts?” This trade which so far as I know has never been seriously considered in the United States (outside such circles of blatant imperialism as the Chicago Tribune, and among the boosters for a bigger navy) is passionately discussed and patriotically dreaded down there in the French Antilles. The local newspapers, inflamed by suggestions from the French press, print furious denunciations of the scheme, and the white colonials express more or less politely their natural disgust of the idea. Recalling the type of rowdy, booze-hunting American citizen whom the great excursion steamers periodically set loose in their ports, one should not be surprised or offended at this repugnance to becoming more closely associated with the richest and most powerful nation in the world.

But considering the matter more seriously I asked myself why should the handing over of these lovely, fertile islands to the United States be the unmitigated disaster that it unquestionably would be to their present inhabitants? The answer to this question reveals the secret of our failure in handling our own race problem and the success the French way with the same problem. Ignoring the economic working of the Eighteenth Amendment in a rum-making territory (which has largely devastated the Virgin Islands we bought from the Danes and which would simply prostrate Martinique and Guadeloupe) the graver reason is that our prejudices unfit us to govern or assimilate a colored people. We should inevitably create another and worse Porto Rican sore, and ruin something fine of great promise if permitted to work itself out, and that is the creation of a French colored civilization. The root of that civilization is the frank acceptance of what we hypocritically shudder at and surreptitiously practice, miscegenation. We have a huge literature, probably largely unscientific, on race hybridization, and the popular mind in America is so clouded on this subject, so closed, and so inflamed that we should consider and treat the populations of these islands merely as “niggers,” offending their pride, ignoring their just claims to individuality, probably trying to suppress their language, as we are engaged in suppressing Spanish in Porto Rico. We are the most intolerant people in the world, as we have recently demonstrated to the Japanese, and the most ignorantly prejudiced, as we are engaged in demonstrating in Haiti. In Martinique and Guadeloupe we should have a more advanced people to deal with than in either Haiti or Porto Rico, and one that the usual American administrator would not have the imagination to understand.

No, the hope for these French foster children, as in a somewhat different way it is for the English colored populations, is to be allowed to extend self-rule, to develop themselves in a climate to which they are admirably adapted—even at the expense of less sugar, cocoa, limes. The world needs the harmonious development of the culture of these mixed white and black people far more than it needs more sugar and other tropical riches. It needs the gaiety, the beauty, the vivid color sense of the French mulatto—another demonstration of the age-old fact that white and black have mingled without terrible consequences, as among the Mediterranean peoples. And America needs the object lesson which the French are giving of a possible humane solution of the race problem.

A Runaway Congress

By GILSON GARDNER

IT never has happened before and that is perhaps why nobody seems to understand exactly what has happened. This last Congress was a coalition Congress. A "runaway" Congress.

Officially, there was in the House and Senate a Republican (Administration) "majority." Practically, that "majority" was wiped out last December when Congress met. Officially, the Republicans were in control and responsible for what this Congress did. Practically, the steering gear never was in their hands. Officially, President Coolidge was supported by a party "majority." Practically, there was no party "majority."

From the time Congress convened—after the very first test of official strength in the House and in the Senate—there never was anything but a coalition majority. The Democrats, in cooperation with the independent bloc in the House and Senate, were in supreme control.

Representative Longworth was nominally the leader of the "majority" but the other day Victor Berger, the Socialist Representative from Milwaukee, spoke humorously but truthfully when he alluded to him as "Minority Leader" Longworth.

It has been an anomalous situation. The Democrats were not the majority and, of course, the Progressive Farmer-Labor group was not the majority. There was no majority, but to all intents and purposes there was a very real and practical working majority which, as before stated, was a coalition majority.

In the coalition majority of Congress the Democratic element was the passive element; the Progressive Republican was the active element. The Democrats were impotent without the help of this independent bloc; the "majority" or "regular" Republicans could not function without its aid. So the liberals in a way held the whip hand on the situation.

It is no wonder the great conservative newspapers of the country have had little to say on this subject. It is a situation they prefer to blink.

The power of the coalition majority was first demonstrated in its check on the organization of the House. After many days of deadlock Leader Longworth of the "majority" was compelled to make terms with the independent bloc and to allow a new provision in the rules which stripped the steering committee of its power to kill legislation by failing to report it. That power was recently shown in forcing out the Howell-Barkley railroad-labor bill.

The first and test fight in the Senate was over the appointment of a chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee which would handle railroad legislation. Was this committee to be left in control of the Coolidge-Conservative Administration? Not if the Democratic-Progressive coalition knew itself, and under La Follette's guidance it apparently did. For after a three weeks' deadlock the coalition voted in Ellison D. Smith of South Carolina as chairman—a Democrat with progressive leanings. Thus the coalition demonstrated to itself and to as much of the outside world as wished to see it that it was in control of the Senate.

Next the power of the coalition was shown in its man-handling of the Mellon tax bill. Neither the Republican nor the Democratic revision of that plan prevailed. The Republicans receded from the Coolidge-Mellon plan as it was edicted from the Treasury Department and White House and later the Democrats had to recede from the Garner revision of the Administration schedule. The bill as it stands is a coalition bill—an adjustment between the Democratic and Progressive bloc.

The coalition's power has been particularly evidenced in the work of the investigating committees—the Walsh Committee; the Brookhart Committee; and the Norris Committee. From the time Walsh sprung the lock that opened Fall's mourning satchel the public has witnessed one long cinematograph of Republican-Democratic graft. When the resolution for an investigation of Daugherty and his Department came up Senator "Hound Tooth" Willis of Ohio was for following the "regular" order which was for Senator Cummins, as presiding officer of the Senate, to name a hand-picked committee to whitewash the Attorney General. Instead of this happening, the coalition majority did the unbelievable thing, permitting a first-term Senator to name his own committee and giving young Mr. Wheeler power to start a 100 per cent sincere investigation of Daugherty-Burns-Jess Smith and Company; and forced the appointment of special counsel to prosecute Fall and recover the stolen naval reserves. The impotent Republican "majority" could do nothing but rush to the White House and urge the resignation of Daugherty.

A proposal to investigate Secretary Mellon's income-tax bureau and turn Francis J. Heney loose on the Treasury Department galvanized the whole Republican "majority" into momentary activity. Senator Jim Watson moved to discharge the Couzens committee, but three days later after thinking over what the coalition might do in an open fight, Jim arose in the Senate and announced that all opposition from his quarter would be withdrawn. Perhaps he thought it was near the end of the session and not very much would happen before the adjournment of Congress in June, and anyway he had his own Coalition out in Indiana to consider. The coalition, under the leadership of Senator George W. Norris, untied the string that held the Muscle Shoals package and Henry's motor lorries have not carried off a parting gift from Congress this session.

The coalition disrupted Congress. In the beginning, the "majority" balked and finding that balking did no good the regulars got scared and ran away. And a runaway Congress carried with it one pension bill, one bonus bill, and one immigration bill made after its own specifications.

The cartoonist who should really happen to see the situation as it is would picture a wagon with a rearing, tearing team, one horse marked Democrat, the other Progressive, with the Senator from Wisconsin, pompadour blown back by the wind, holding tight to the reins while little Cal is seen bobbing up and down near the tailboard hanging on for dear life.

The New Education

By AGNES DE LIMA

I. In the Public Schools

KNOCKING our schools and the product of our schools has long been a popular pastime. It is doubtful if any other American institution comes in for such incessant criticism. President Pritchett of the Carnegie Foundation is solemnly certain that the reason lies in our attempt to educate too many of us, and in spending too much money in the process. He is, however, only one of a large company who each, according to his temperament or economic status, knows what ails us educationally. "Petticoat teaching," declares a visiting premier, "that accounts for British boys being two years ahead of American boys of the same age." "No, our aims are too diffuse, and our motives superficial," reports a college president. "Too many fads and frills," says the man of affairs. "Not enough grounding in fundamentals," says another. Underpaid teachers, overcrowded classes, obsolete teaching methods, too rigid a curriculum, inflexible grading, neglect of the individual, no connection with real life. . . .

Yet under all the grilling and controversy now raging in the educational world something very like a revolution is going on. The "new education" is given feature space in popular magazines, modern schools are heralded in many centers, educational experiments are invading even the most hidebound of school systems. To be sure there is little agreement as to what the "new education" is. To some it represents merely certain mechanical or administrative reforms or new ways of doing old tasks. To others it means a complete abandonment of former educational standards with their narrow emphasis upon fact cramming regardless of the child's needs and capacities. In these newer schools or classes, formal recitations are abolished, together with set lessons and fixed courses of study. Workshops and laboratories supplement or take the place of the ordinary classroom, on the assumption that with materials and the chance to use them, children will not only acquire the necessary skill in the three R's, but will develop creatively.

The more radical of these experiments are, of course, being made outside the public schools, although there are isolated instances even under public-school conditions. Such an experiment is now going forward in an annex of Public School 61 on the East Side of Manhattan under the able leadership of Elisabeth Irwin. Another—conducted for four years in Montgomery County, Missouri, in a rural school—has just been made the subject of a noteworthy book by Prof. Ellsworth Collings of the University of Oklahoma.*

Miss Irwin's experiment grew out of her five years of pioneer work in mental testing, and is a real attempt to modify the course of study in accordance with the varying needs of children as disclosed by the tests. Her present classes started over a year ago as a cooperative effort of various private agencies and the city school authorities. Dr. George M. Parker, the psychiatrist, and three associates are also connected with the work.

There are one hundred children divided into four groups—bright, normal, dull normal, and neurotic. They have now completed the second grade, and Miss Irwin's hope is to add another set of beginners next fall, and thus gradually build up a school to the junior high-school grade. Neither the daily program nor the equipment bears much resemblance to the ordinary school. Low tables and chairs replace cumbersome and immovable school desks; hangings, plants, and gay decorations fashioned by the children themselves give the rooms distinction and charm. Formal work is minimized and ample opportunity is given the children to learn through free activity and first-hand experience. Plenty of materials are at hand—clay, wood, sand, blocks, weaving, paints. Dramatics, music, dancing, rhythm, and independent projects fill much of the day.

The three R's are adequately taken care of, though not in the ordinary stultifying fashion. Miss Irwin believes that we know nothing at all about the learning process, that children do not learn by dint of drill and subject matter presented in logical sequence; but, supplied with an environment where creative activity is possible, they seem to acquire an amazing amount of real knowledge. She tells the story of a mother who was distressed because her seven-year-old George could not write, although he had been in school a term and a half. The family was about to move uptown, and the mother feared for George's standing in a traditional school. "Never mind; we'll teach him to write before you move," Miss Irwin declared. "But we go next Monday," moaned the mother. "We'll teach him," Miss Irwin repeated. And they did—in two days! Mrs. Marietta Johnson has often spoken of children's "bursting" into literacy! Something of the sort happened to this boy.

Mr. Collings attained even more striking results in his experiment. His actual aims were not to teach subjects, but to better the life of his pupils, using all their interests and desires, good and bad. The content of their school activity was made up of these interests, the curriculum being constantly made "on the spot" by pupils and teacher in conference. Concretely the children engaged in enterprises, too numerous even to indicate here, which fell naturally into four groups: play, excursion, story, and hand projects. These included games, folk dancing, dramatizations, and social parties; study of community activities and problems; stories in all their forms, oral, song, pictures, and music; shop and construction work, making furniture, growing vegetables, preparing school luncheons.

Current check was kept of the proficiency gained in formal subjects both in the experimental school and in two neighboring schools where the traditional course of study was strictly followed. The tests at the end of the four years showed the experimental school far in the lead. Enrolment and attendance in the school rose to almost perfection level, tardiness and punishment cases dropped to nothing, high-school entrants increased, while the traditional schools maintained their former low figures. The homes of the experimental school-children reflected improvement. More and better books and periodicals were read, home and farm conveniences were installed, illness from preventable diseases decreased. As Prof. William H. Kilpatrick states in his introduction to the book, "It can no longer be said that the theory won't work. It has worked." But it must be said that in comparison with such experiments as the foregoing, much of what is styled experimental in the public schools appears as mere pretense. New York and other cities have set aside certain official centers where attempts are made to grade children scientifically, and to modify the course of study to meet their varying needs. The testing and grading of the children according to mental ability have progressed briskly enough, and the advantages of more homogeneous grouping are many. Slow and quick pupils need no longer interfere with one another, but may each proceed at their own rate. But the "modified" course of study as yet holds out little hope of permanent educational reform.

* "An Experiment with a Project Curriculum." By Ellsworth Collings. The Macmillan Company, 1921.

A visitor to most of these "experimental" schools would never guess that anything different or new was being tried. In each classroom are the same rigid rows held in absolute silence, the same routine, the same doling out of irrelevant facts and uninviting abstractions. It is, we will say, a Friday, and the weekly tests are being given. "Take out your prefix words," drones the teacher. The class, fifty apathetic little robots, operating as a unit, slip one book off the desks and another one on them. "Prefix words!" What in the name of conscience have they to do either with children or with education?

The reason no doubt is the persistence in the pedagogical mind of the notion that there is something intrinsically sacred about a course of study. New York's Department of Education has recently issued a report on Grading and the Course of Study which summarizes the methods by which New York and other cities are dealing with the problems of retardation, promotion, and modification of the curriculum. Here we may see how the professional educator behaves when faced with a serious breakdown in the educational machine. For that is what retardation means—millions of children annually throughout the country clogging the wheels of what should be a smoothly running process. They cannot or will not follow the prescribed time-table and when promotion time comes round and large masses should automatically move forward, these recalcitrants balk, to the utter confusion of the operators of the machine. What is the remedy? Abolish the time-table, scrap the machinery, and start afresh with the children as developing, growing human beings? Heaven forbid!

"Our chief task," says the report, "is to speed up the 46 per cent of slow-progress pupils."

The "multiple track" method employed by Oakland, California, is dwelt upon at length. This provides for five general types of classes—accelerated, normal, opportunity, limited, atypical. The plan calls for a differentiated course of study—"enrichment" on one hand, and "minimum essentials" on the other. "The main consideration is to have the progress of all pupils continuous."

The curriculum and the time-table are thus the Procrustean bed into which the child, by devices nowadays scientifically determined, must somehow be fitted. Never a hint anywhere in the report that fulfilling the requirements of a prescribed course of study may bear little or no relation to the learning process, that it may in fact make real learning forever impossible by destroying the child's initiative, natural curiosity, and originality. Never a hint that attention to the real needs of children, to the exigencies of their growth, is the only means of insuring that what is learned has any real value or gets any real hold on the child's imagination and interest. Instead, advises the educational "repair man," clip off the minutes from the time ordinarily devoted to one subject and apply them to another, "dilute" here, "enrich" there, speed up this lot, slow up this one, re-grade, regroup, measure, then compute your percentage of gains. If they are not high enough try again—on the same old lines.

Experiments like those of Miss Irwin and Prof. Collings point the way to another educational order. Less radical, but none the less hopeful methods are being tested elsewhere. A strange term—as yet merely an abstraction—is beginning to creep into the reports of public-school officials. This term is "individual child." Scientific tests are beginning to establish as a certainty what only the most progressive teacher dared to intimate before—that children differ profoundly and that education must minister to the needs of each. A number of schemes are in operation to permit children to direct their own studies, within limits. The best known of these is the Dalton Laboratory Plan, originated by Miss Helen Parkhurst in Dalton, Mass. Under this plan, pupils are released from recitation periods for part of each day, and may pursue any subject they please, provided that they cover the required work in all subjects within a given period of time. The method definitely breaks up the lock-step and permits each child to progress at his own rate of speed.

Some fifty cities also have adopted some form of the work-study-play or Gary plan in some form. This method, so hotly contested in New York some years ago, and rejected through the manipulations of politicians, makes it financially possible for all schools to provide the plant and equipment necessary for modern schooling: playgrounds, laboratories, and workshops, hitherto reserved for upper grades or a limited number of schools.

These represent beginnings only, but they are significant as indicating a new orientation in educational thought and practice. Their extension will necessarily be slow and under fire every step of the way. It would be foolhardy to attempt the too rapid adoption of any one of the newer reforms. Certain textbooks about the project method show how formalized the best of methods can become in unimaginative hands. The present "mental-age-grading" experiments in New York may degenerate into merely another mechanical device, but they may develop into genuine centers for studying and meeting the needs of children. In these schools there is much discussion of ways of educating the "dull normal" child, whose protest against the overbookishness of the present curriculum has accounted in large measure for the retardation problem. A few educators are concerning themselves with the gifted child. Some schools have special classes for children with extraordinarily high "I. Q.'s." Perhaps the time is not far distant when a child need be neither feeble-minded, physically handicapped, dull, nor overbright to receive the benefits of teaching consciously designed to meet his needs instead of the maintenance of a more or less venerable tradition.

In two succeeding articles Agnes de Lima will describe the advances that have been made in methods of teaching in some of the long-established private schools and in the younger and more radical "experimental" institutions.

Cleveland's Best Minds by Art Young

Keynote Burton of Ohio

Convention Oratory

He Didn't Know It Was Loaded

The Nation Representatives at the Convention

Art Young: Sinclair Lewis was right: Reporting a convention from the wide open spaces is much better.

Democratic Infantry

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

OUR text this week, while the Republicans are dispersing from Cleveland, and while the Democrats are in preparation to converge upon New York, is to be found, beloved brethren, in a happy remark recently made by a Southern Senator.

"There is cavalry and there is artillery and there is infantry," said he, "in politics. The Republicans have the cavalry and the artillery. They canter way out in front with La Follette and Brookhart and Frazier and Howell and they even send out advance scouts who get separated from the Republican line of march and go forward in some new uniform—scouts like Shipstead and Magnus Johnson, ex-Republicans, Farmer-Laborites. Meanwhile the artillery, way back in the rear, is also Republican. It comes lumbering along with Smoot and Warren and Lodge, complaining about the roads and wanting to settle right down and bombard from where it is. In the middle we march—we Democrats. Sometimes we fall back and dig in with the artillery. Sometimes we hurry forward and collaborate with the cavalry. We keep in touch with both ends. We save the country by being conservative. We save the country by being progressive. We always save the country, of course. We save it by walking on our feet, in the middle. We, my dear young friend, we Democrats, are the country's dull plodding salvation. The Republicans have the biggest reactionary emplaced guns. The Republicans have the loneliest radical reconnoitering horsemen. We Democrats are infantry, infantry, just infantry."

He said it. The Democrats in Washington have indeed a few artillerymen—like Bruce of Maryland, who will have to be abandoned on the field of battle, if the battle is lost, because no power on earth can move him. They have two or three cavalymen: Wheeler of Montana, Dill of Washington, Huddleston of Alabama—gentlemen with the fire of adventure in their eyes. Otherwise, for the most part, and for the overwhelming part, the Democrats are persons with a certain idealism in their veins and a certain considerable constant caution in their feet.

Now Coolidge has given the Democrats a chance to be more than ever addicted to infantricide. Coolidge has made the Republican Party the absolute artillery party. He has decided to get along without cavalry altogether.

That dashing heavy dragoon, Mr. John T. Adams, chairman of the Republican National Committee, is to go. He had already gone too far. He was not content with being against the League of Nations. He was also against all its works. He was against the League Court. Artilleryman in economics, he was a cavalryman—an "extremist"—in foreign policy. He went the limit. He is to be succeeded by Samuel M. Butler of Massachusetts, who obeys the speed laws and who is expected to offer no open opposition to the policy of approaching the League without touching it.

In the Republican National Convention there might have been Charles L. Knight of Ohio for Temporary Chairman. He is a distinguished newspaper publisher, an extraordinarily powerful writer and speaker, an ex-Congressman, a strong Coolidge man, a Coolidge delegate. Yes. But an ex-Rooseveltian.

So there was not Mr. Knight of Ohio for Temporary Chairman. There was Theodore E. Burton of Ohio, one of the ablest and one of the finest characters in Congress, and an artilleryman to the marrow of his firm and fixed backbone.

Then for Permanent Chairman, since the West had to be cultivated, there might have been Howell of Nebraska, who has just been elected to the Senate and who for many years has been Republican National Committeeman from Nebraska—an official and a useful Republican, who took Nebraska senatorially away from the Democrats by defeating his dear friend the former Senator and abiding Democrat, Gilbert M. Hitchcock.

Howell, however, ran some municipally owned public utilities terribly well in Omaha. He has also in the Senate given his name to the Howell bill for readjusting the relations between labor and capital on railroads in a manner and by a method desired by the railroad trade unions.

So there was not Mr. Howell for Permanent Chairman. There was Frank W. Mondell of Wyoming, who lost the last senatorial fight in Wyoming to the Democrat John B. Kendrick, and who is one of the nicest and sweetest and most convinced artillerymen in human existence.

Then it became necessary, in order to get a chairman of the Resolutions Committee, to go all the way to Mexico City in order to get Ambassador Charles B. Warren, who will look at no gun under 83-caliber and 16-inch diameter.

It is all very well to say that Coolidge has no courage. This writer claims that Coolidge has both courage and consistency. Do we want a new logical alignment of parties in America? Coolidge has done his full share on that topic. He has made the Republican Party the artillery party of America, in its control, in its management, supremely beyond all precedent.

This writer narrates that fact with an absolute indifference to the outcome. For now watch the Democrats.

Only the menace of La Follette would make the Democrats think of any cavalry raids issuing from the convention in New York.

Observe the record of the Democrats in Congress. They produced the votes which continued the existence of tax-exempt municipal and State securities through which the large investor can escape all federal income taxes and through which impecunious Southern cities can borrow from the large investor at a low rate of interest.

They were strong for taxing the rich except at moments when the rich would lend money to them.

Overwhelmingly they were willing to take this nation's property at Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River and hand it over to Henry Ford at a great loss to the nation and at an enormous potential personal profit to Mr. Ford simply because Mr. Ford allowed it to be alleged that by reducing the price of fertilizers he would put private gain into the private pockets of Southern farmers.

Many additional mean things might be said against the Democrats. These mean things would be justified. So would many lofty and yearning and idealistic things.

The Democrats are undoubtedly in touch with the cavalry. They are in touch now with the La Follette railroad trade union political convention which will meet in Cleveland on July 4. Most Democrats in the House of Representatives willingly and outrightly supported the Howell bill—called in the House of Representatives the Barkley bill—wanted by the railroad trade unions.

The pace of the Democratic Party in New York on June 24 will be in considerable degree proportioned to the prospective pace of La Follette at Cleveland on Independence Day.

Run, La Follette, run. The infantry is after you.

A Heretic on Trial

By CHARLES B. DRISCOLL

Cleveland, June 1

A LONG, narrow chapel, in the English style. Dark, except for the artificial light, and gloomy. Four hundred seats, all filled with sightseers who have crowded in to behold the day's most entertaining anachronism. Outside, the rain is falling steadily, and the curious crowd is uneasy. There is a long delay in the beginning of the afternoon session. Already the show is an hour overdue.

Forward, center, a row of kitchen tables, covered with books and papers. To the left of these, another row of tables, at which sit the reporters, forty or more of them, cracking jokes and lazily deriding the story they are here to write.

A stir in the rear of the audience. The bishops are coming. The audience rises. Down the center aisle file the eight old men, in black-and-white gowns, who constitute the court. After them a group of men carrying books and brief cases, and one white-haired, keen-faced old man in a black cassock. The lawyers and the defendant.

The eight in the black-and-white gowns step upon the rostrum in the forward end of the room and take their chairs, each before his own little table. One takes the center chair and table, the others are ranged about in a half-circle on both sides of him.

The black-and-white ones on the rostrum sit. The lawyers, clerks, advisers, and experts on this and that gather about their tables. The black-and-white ones are a little nervous and quite awkward and self-conscious. The one in the center grasps a little wooden mallet and makes as if to hit the table with it, then changes his mind, forgets to offer the customary prayer, and says, in an effort to be natural: "Gentlemen, you may sit down."

And the court that is trying William Montgomery Brown, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, is in session. In Cleveland, Ohio, a town of nearly a million people, with street cars running to and fro outside, and with electric lights dispelling at least some of the darkness within, these eight old men in the black-and-white dresses that are so unbecoming are trying the other old man, there beside the table, for heresy. They are accusers, judges, and jury.

Each judge scowls at his separate table, or tries visibly to look like a judge. Apparently, none of them knows anything at all about judicial procedure, and the presiding judge is pitiable in his ignorance of even such rules of action as one might learn by watching a police court function for two hours. One of the judges looks like John D. Rockefeller. Another, who rather cringes before the gaze of the audience, has departed so far from the orthodox as to have the black part of his outfit made just a little bit purple. Maybe that is why he shrinks. Possibly he foresees the possibility of being tried for this Romanistic bit of heresy.

You feel that the scene is not satisfyingly medieval. For instance, one of the judges wears a mustache. You feel sure that none of the members of the court that tried Joan wore a mustache. One of the judges pulls his skirt up to his knees when he sits down, and continues to look ludicrous throughout the session. Two of them cross their legs, thereby losing caste with the crowd. The presiding judge sucks at his spectacles nearly all the time, and not infrequently falls to sucking his thumb thoughtfully. Some of the reverend judges whisper and joke among themselves, and laugh from time to time to relieve their embarrassment. They read the papers, and they are conscious of the sorry figure the court is making of itself in the eyes of the public.

An effort has been made to give the court a setting as well as a sitting. A maroon curtain is the background, and a maroon carpet covers the rostrum. Above the heads of the judges is a stained-glass window presenting a very florid picture of God in pleated skirt, four sizes too large, cape awry and partly fastened with an emerald as big as a saucer. God, in this picture, has red hair and whiskers.

In front of the half circle of judges, and to its left is the witness chair, conventionally raised upon a dais that has been so hastily improvised that it threatens to collapse when a fat bishop mounts the chair, and the whole court engages in issuing directions as to how to avert catastrophe. Finally the dais is shoved to one side, the witness chair is placed on the level of the court, and the trial of Bishop Brown proceeds.

The presiding judge rises and informs the audience that the court is sorry it has kept counsel waiting, but it has been very busy. He then reads a long typewritten statement, denying the defendant the right to put all the bishops of the church upon the witness stand in order to find out what they believe, and thus learn what is the doctrine he is accused of being heretic to. The statement recites that the doctrine may be found in the Book of Common Prayer.

Twentieth-century lawyers, in gray and brown business suits, are pleading and arguing and wrangling before this thirteenth-century court, and the effect is strange. These men who can drive automobiles and cast ballots at elections stand here in this Gothic room and argue hotly about whether the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father or from the Father and the Son, and whether a bishop shall be deemed guilty of heresy because he refuses to recant what he has written about capitalism and superstition. It is all very serious and momentous, but every once in a while the reporters at the long tables have to hide behind their hats and laugh.

The audience is less polite than the reporters. It gives vent to a loud guffaw whenever something particularly amusing occurs. Then the presiding bishop almost bites his glasses in two, and says:

"The court requests absolute order in the room."

The audience is composed largely of heretics who share at least some of the views of the defendant. Socialists, Communists, rebels, independents, radicals of every stripe. Non-conformists of all creeds. And there is a sprinkling of orthodox ministers of the gospel, come to see the humbling of a heretic, and secretly hoping that some way may be found to get a permit from the fire department to burn the old man in the public square beside the bronze statue of Tom Johnson, another heretic, who once was mayor of this city of Cleveland.

"So you're going to condemn him as a heretic!" shouts the lawyer for the defense. "And the twentieth century! Heavens! I seem to hear the flames of Smithfield crackling about us!"

The judges on the rostrum wriggle in their chairs. They do not know whether they should permit this impudent lawyer, who has defended Eugene Debs and other economic heretics before the bars of civil courts, to talk thus in the presence of the hierarchy of the church. Surely Rome would not let her dignity be insulted thus—and right before the eyes of the rabble!

But one glance to the right of the court, where the busy reporters are preparing their copy and sending it scurrying for the extra editions by the hands of gum-chewing messenger boys, is sufficient to convince any court that that elder day is gone. There were no reporters at the trials of the good old heretics, nor in the public squares where the sizzling fires were builded by consecrated hands. Ah, friends, a bishop was a bishop once!

The verdict! The verdict! The court-jury-accuser is coming in to deliver the verdict! The heretical audience rises. The court takes its place. The verdict is read by the presiding dignitary from a typewritten sheet.

"Guilty of heresy."

The tremendous moment falls flat. There is no thrill in it. Something is wrong. The verdict has been delivered, and nobody trembles, nobody weeps, nobody begs for mercy. The defendant smiles good-naturedly. His friends surround him, shaking hands, laughing, talking without heat and without excitement. The defendant, who is neither a very learned nor a very important man in the world of men, has become a hero.

The court, on the other hand, cuts rather a sorry figure at the close of its great task. Nobody notices it. Its members, for a brief time elevated to the center of the stage, are straggling anonymously out of the church, trying to keep close to one another, nervously talking about outgoing trains.

There seems to be confusion in the minds of the spectators, as well as in the minds of the readers of the newspapers, concerning this trial that has just closed. Some maintain that Bishop Brown was on trial. Others stoutly declare that this is a garbled version, and that, as a matter of fact, it was an old and tottering institution that was on trial.

Renunciation

By WILLIAM A. DRAKE

It is written in the book of Meng Tzu, that he who cannot fulfil his charge must relinquish it.

I have no choice.

I lift my hand from your soul, and give you back to the world.

A Communication

Sauce for Mr. Daugherty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that the Senate committee investigating oil has reported, now that Burns has resigned, and the new Attorney General has been urged to suspend the spy system, it is interesting to consider the defense of ex-Attorney General Daugherty set forth in his letter of March 23 to the President. He asks whether this Government is to retain "its guaranties of individual rights and its safeguards for equal justice to the highest and the humblest, or is it to become a government of slander, by terrorism and by fear?" He says:

In the battle for my rights, as an official and a citizen, the rights of every citizen of this republic are involved, for who of all our millions of people knows but that he may be the next to become the object of unjust accusation maintained by lawless inquisition?

Daugherty's complaint is sound. It is a cry that liberals have been making for years. At last the cry has come from a high official of the Department of Justice. But those who institute a system should not complain.

A. Mitchell Palmer was notorious for making defenseless people the objects of "unjust accusation maintained by lawless inquisition," and the recent administration of the Department has not been free from such endeavor. These men seemed occasionally to forget that the rights of every citizen are involved in the violation of the rights of any citizen.

Daugherty objects that the witnesses against him were disreputable. But we have all heard district attorneys in courts of law tell juries that they cannot choose their witnesses, and that if the defendants choose to associate with disreputable people they must necessarily be the ones to give testimony.

Section 37 of the Revised Statutes, referring to conspiracies against the United States, has been commonly used by the Department of Justice. Senator Wheeler says that there is evidence that Daugherty committed a crime. He was, no doubt, referring to this section. Under this section a number of individuals are joined and tried together as defendants. In the federal courts separate trials are not a matter of right and are seldom, if ever, granted. The purpose of alleging a conspiracy and trying a conspiracy case is that in that way acts and statements of each defendant may under certain circumstances be regarded as affecting the others. Juries are allowed to draw conclusions from circumstantial evidence. It is easy to create an atmosphere.

In the case against Daugherty there is no direct evidence but there are facts from which inferences might be drawn. They have been drawn by the public. They might be drawn by a jury. Gaston Means, employed by the Department of Justice, testified that he received $100,000 in cash from Mitsui Japanese interests; that he paid this money to Jesse Smith, the intimate associate of Daugherty—this for the purpose of stopping the prosecution of the Standard Aircraft case. Roxie Stinson, divorced wife of Jesse Smith, testified that she saw the $100,000 in cash in a money belt which Smith wore. Smith had a room at the Department of Justice, lived with Daugherty, and attended conferences at the Little Green House on K Street. The Department of Justice did not proceed with the prosecution of the Standard Aircraft case. If Means, Jesse Smith (were he alive), Daugherty, and various others connected with the matter were indicted in a conspiracy case under this section, the jury might speculate as to the guilt of any of the defendants, and if the judge charged the jury (as was the charge in the case against Edward A. Rumely and others) that knowledge might be "imputed" to a defendant, there might conceivably be a conviction.

A former Attorney General, A. Mitchell Palmer, seems likewise to have been what he might call "the object of unjust accusation maintained by lawless inquisition." There is testimony that Martin E. Kern of Allentown, Pennsylvania, a friend of Mr. Palmer, had something to do with the seizure of the Germantown Bosch Magneto plant. Kern's previous career seems to have been unsavory. An intimate friend of Kern, named A. T. Murray, was made one of the trustees and general managers of the plant. After a few months' operation the plant was sold to a bidder representing Kern without much question as to whether or not Kern was an American citizen (sales were limited to American citizens) for $4,100,000 and the stock was immediately sold to the public at a much higher figure. Kern and Murray seem to have made almost $600,000 out of the deal. J. Harry Covington, who was described as campaign manager for Mr. Palmer in 1920, is said to have received $26,000 in legal fees. It would not seem to be difficult to "impute" knowledge to Palmer and to charge all of these men, including Palmer, under Section 37 of the Revised Statutes.

Palmer is also connected with McLean. He testified that without investigation he believed McLean when the latter told him that he had loaned Fall $100,000, and Palmer therefore endeavored to avoid a situation where McLean would be compelled to testify under oath.

That charges should lie against men on such facts may seem unfair, unjust, un-American, and contrary to Anglo-Saxon institutions, but it is the kind of law for which the Department of Justice has made itself responsible. One is pleased that Daugherty has seen the danger and protested against it. It would be pleasant if A. Mitchell Palmer would declaim his protest to the world.

New York, May 10

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

The Nordics

By ARTHUR GUITERMAN

The blond, gigantic Nordics
Unsheathed their shining swordies
On Viking trips
In dragon-ships
Against the Southern hordies.

The kind, longheaded Nordics
Preserved their conquered wardies,
But ruled their lands
With able hands
And never paid their boardies.

Those supermen, the Nordics,
Remain our hearts' adoredies;
They keep us straight,
They guide our fate,
They dwell in sweet accordies.

Still rule! triumphant Nordics,
Including Henry Fordies,
By right divine,
Resplendent line,
Creation's chosen lordies!

In the Driftway

NATURALLY when the Drifter was in college he committed a good many indiscretions. One of them, as he looks back upon it, was going to college at all; another was joining a fraternity. The latter was the least serious of the two, for fraternities are comparatively harmless. One loses his pin inside of two years after leaving college and within five he has forgotten the password and the grip.

* * * * *

WHILE in college, though, a fraternity is a serious matter. Many students feel that not to "make a frat" will disgrace them more in the eyes of their friends at home than failure to get their diploma. So, with the exception of athletics, the average student takes nothing in his college life more seriously than his fraternity. The "frat" to which the Drifter belonged used to hold a weekly meeting—Friday nights, as the Drifter recalls it—in the cellar of the chapter house, each "brother" wearing a robe and everybody going through a ritual which appealed to youth's love of mystery but now appears as so much solemn nonsense. The great times, though, were the initiations of new members, which occurred once or twice a year. On such occasions the fraternity members could indulge their animal spirits by pounding, kicking, and banging about their about-to-be "brother" without his daring to hit or even to talk back. Once, the Drifter remembers, he was helping to roll a "college man," with his hands tied behind him, down a steep hill when the victim struck a broken bottle and was seriously cut. A local physician, who was also a fraternity alumnus, was summoned. He put the young man to bed, and reported a case of pneumonia to the college authorities.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is reminded of all this by receiving from his chapter what is described as the "Eighth Province Rushing Blank," a "standard form" adopted by a group of colleges last spring. Freshmen were "rushed" in hit-or-miss fashion in the Drifter's day, but times have changed. The competition for good "frat material" has become so keen that the fraternities get busy in regard to new members back in the preparatory schools. The "Eighth Province Rushing Blank" is sent to the Drifter, evidently, in order that he can recommend to his chapter some of his young friends who are getting ready for college. The first item of information which the blank asks for is "Name of Rushee." That is a new word since the Drifter's day. He has forgotten what the prospective victims were called then, but he knows it was nothing so short and snappy as "rushee." Further down on the blank one is asked to describe the student's "social standing" and "physical appearance." Then comes the searching question: "Is he athletic material?" If so, the Drifter imagines that the subsequent inquiry, "What are his financial prospects?" is of less consequence. Finally, the Drifter is asked to give the "exact date" of the "rushee's" arrival, including the railroad and the hour, a. m. or p. m. This so that his own fraternity rather than a rival shall have the first chance at a handshake and such ingratiating propaganda as may seem in order.

* * * * *

ALL good in its way, no doubt, yet the Drifter surmises that he will forget to fill out the "Eighth Province Rushing Blank." As he passes in mind his young friends who are college bound, he is not sure that any would pass the tests in "social standing" or "physical appearance," and he has a hunch that their "financial prospects" depend almost wholly upon Dad. Indeed, if the Drifter knew any young man who measured right up to fraternity demands he would suggest that he be sent not to college but to work for a couple of years on a farm or at sea. The lads whom the Drifter likes best are rough diamonds, a description of whom would not look at all impressive on the "Eighth Province Rushing Blank."

* * * * *

WHICH suggests the question, How did the Drifter ever get into a college fraternity? Well, for one thing, there were no "rushing blanks" in his day. Besides, although he is undoubtedly rough, no alchemy could ever reveal him as a diamond.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

German-Danish Minorities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your issue of March 19 contains a letter on the question of the German-Danish minorities. As this problem formed the subject of deliberations at the congress of the Minorities Committee of the Association of the League of Nations Unions, which took place quite recently at the Hague, and as we discussed the question in a friendly manner with the Danish representatives, I beg permission to add a few observations.

In Germany education lies wholly in the hands of the state. German educational laws are based on the idea that only the firm authority of the state can guarantee that education will develop everywhere on the same lines and that the schools will be open to all children alike, whatever the position of the parents may be. Denmark, on the other hand, enjoys full freedom in the question of education and its development is left to private initiative.

The minority problem is also far more complicated in Germany than it is in Denmark. Germany harbors various minorities, differing as regards race, religion, culture, spiritual outlook, and methods of political warfare. For this reason the legal solution on a uniform basis of the minority problem is far more difficult for Germany than it is for Denmark, which has to deal only with the German minority. We, the German League of Nations Union, take the point of view that only the conclusion of a treaty between Germany and Denmark defining the equal treatment of the minorities to the north and the south of the frontier can bring about a satisfactory solution of the problem. The German Government as far as we know is quite ready to conclude such an agreement. As both parties to the treaty would doubtlessly conscientiously observe their obligations, we are of the opinion that such an agreement would at once remove the present friction. However, it must be remembered that the plebiscite in 1920 was not wisely administered. While in the southern zone the votes in every community were collected separately, the plebiscite in the northern zone comprised the entire zone as one voting unit. There can be no doubt that the overwhelming majority of the northern zone voted for Denmark, but owing to the method employed the purely German districts of Tondern, Hoyer, and Tinglev came under Danish sovereignty. This explains why the German frontier population, which quite naturally is much more excitable than the population of inland districts, has the feeling of being treated unfairly. But this being one of the least important injustices which the Treaty of Versailles imposed upon us, we do not especially stress the point.

Berlin, April 15

H. A. HARDER,

General Secretary of the German League of Nations Union

Straightening the Record

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Hard's letter in your issue of June 4 indicates that advancing years are diminishing his adequate supply of limited omniscience. Usually Bill Hard is accurate, but he does an injustice to the hundreds of thousands of progressive farmers who are bitterly opposed to such an economic monstrosity as the McNary-Haugen bill when he asserts that there was practical unanimity among farm organizations in favor of this bill, which all the progressive farm papers also denounced.

Perhaps he was misled by not reading all the hearings of the Committee on Agriculture in favor of the Norris-Sinclair bill. He may have been thrown off his straight and narrow track by the fact that Chairman Haugen of the House Committee on Agriculture, through the connivance of some other stand-patters on his committee, suppressed the two-hour testimony which I gave before his committee against his bill about two and a half months ago.

Some farmers can't think straight, but few who do favor the Haugen bill; but, anyhow, why scrap over a corpse? Just let us keep the record as straight as it is, and elect a Congress which will repeal the special privileges in land, transportation, credit, and marketing systems, to say nothing of taxation, which brought about the Agrarian Revolution.

Washington, June 2

BENJAMIN C. MARSH,

Managing Director, Farmers' National Council

Political Prophecy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Let me try to forecast the results of the impending national conventions. Looking backward, we now perceive the reasons which convinced the little group of party leaders that Mr. Harding was the choice of the people. Every delegate knew that Mr. Harding had lost some of his home State districts to General Wood and that he had run fourth and last in his neighbor State of Indiana. The Republican chiefs at Chicago in 1920 must have foreseen that the Democrats would not grasp the opportunity to become America's liberal party.

This year the G. O. P. will nominate Mr. Coolidge, and with him some not-too-radical progressive, resident in the Middle West, probably Judge Kenyon of Iowa. The platform will demand tax reduction, a well-planned and cautious reduction; a World Court "without compromise of our national independence" will be advocated. The constitutional provision for freedom of religion will be solemnly approved and reference will be made to the virtues of our naturalized citizens. No more direct mention of Ku Klux will be made, though lynching will be denounced, as will dishonesty in public office "when the same is proved before a competent tribunal." The farmer will be praised, and politely advised to try cooperative buying and selling and to get away from the "one-crop" idea. The platform will also point with pride. To what? Well, now, for the small consideration of one good political plum, I will undertake to write this difficult paragraph in a way that will cause the convention to rise and cheer. You say someone already has this assignment on the same terms? Just my luck.

Now for the Democrats. How tame the prize-fights conducted at Madison Square Garden when compared to this battle royal which Tex Rickard has landed! No limit to the number of rounds. No rule against hitting in the clinches. But the Smiths and McAdoos will plunge into battle without considering that they might overlook their differences in regard to churches and beverages, and unite to form a great new party for the common people, North and South, naturalized and native-born. No, the Democratic Party will continue in the old rut. McAdoo will early be ready to trade. He will have about 400 votes, but they will not be enthusiastic for his candidacy. Smith's 200 will seem formidable, seconded, as they will be, by the shouting thousands on the streets. At last the trading will be accomplished. The party will have nominated two "good Americans," one a New Yorker that nobody west of the Hudson ever heard of; the other a favorite son from somewhere east of Iowa and west of Pennsylvania. Both Protestants. Broad-minded men, too. Speak to their Papist and Jewish acquaintances. Neither one dared to be dubbed a Prohibitionist or a Suffragist back in the days when these things were being urged. In fact, neither ever stood for anything new. But now they are ready to stand siege or give battle for "things as they are." The Democratic papers will at once dig into their respective "home towns" and we will be assured that "our great standard bearers" are very human.

The platform will assail the Republicans because of Teapot Dome; it will hint that many other scandals are yet to be uncovered. The farmer will be wept over and assured that all would be different if we had stayed in Europe. Mr. Wilson will be extolled as one of the world's greatest men. The League will not be mentioned by name, but its ghost will be invoked to prevent more wars.

And Coolidge will carry New York and the election.

Los Angeles, May 15

J. HENRY BRAND

A Suggestion from Germany

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Possibly some of your readers will be interested in co-operating in a scheme for the furtherance of amity and understanding between nations described in this extract from a letter received by me recently. It was written by a banker in Cologne. I will not attempt to correct my friend's English, now grown quaint from disuse. It would merely destroy its genuineness without adding to its appeal.

You in a settled country can't understand what we over here have to go through. War is still going on. People are not shot, but starve away by hunger; and we can't see when all this will end. . . . For me, and for a very few of my friends, the only way to reach a permanent peace in Europe is to hammer into the minds of the people the idea of the United States of Europe, after your scheme in America.

A friend of mine has tried to bring this idea forward in France, Germany, and England, and has spent all his money for it, without result. The diplomatists don't believe in these powerful ideas. . . . As you speak in your letter about the Quakers, I wanted to ask if in your country there are men who would spend some money for an international newspaper to work in this direction. . . . Please let me have a line to tell me if there is much interest in this question, and if it would be possible to get some money together for this friend of mine, that he might be able to work further. Now he is so absolutely short of money that he has to give it up. I also intend to write to friends of mine in France and England to collect a little sum to enable him to go on.

Navesink, N. J., April 18

MARGARET LINTE RAOUL

"When the Bands Begin to Play"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Just the other day, while passing through a town which I will not name, I was rather forcibly jerked back to the days of 1917 when the youth of the land was being called upon to make this world a decent place to live in for all time to come. It was my privilege to be included in that multitude of care-free, sincere young men. To go to war has ever been the privilege of youth.

I was in southern California when the call to arms reached me. On the way North we were given the freedom of the city wherever our trains stopped. Each town tried to outdo the rest in showing its appreciation of the way in which the boys marched off leaving all their material goods behind, leaving all those near to them—perhaps for all time.

And the city whose name I must suppress outdid all others. Nowhere else were we so feted and so cheered. That great armory fairly shining with cleanliness; those huge tables with heaps of delicious food and dainties which the women had lovingly prepared for us. . . .

How different was my recent entry and reception in that town, six years after the previous triumphant visit. Having finished doing my yearly assessment work in the desert hills, I was returning to San Francisco, traveling part of the way on freight trains. Arriving within the city limits I began to hike through the town with a couple of other young men. For four nights I had had but very little sleep. All of that night had passed in waiting and riding on a freight train.

We encountered an officer of the law in the street. He promptly proceeded to "frisk" us. I inquired for a search warrant. I spoke as man to man, not meekly, nor yet brazenly. Being tired out from honest toil, homeward bound, and with nearly ten dollars in cash left in my jeans, I was anxious to be on my way.

Right there I learned that no man on the road is supposed to question the wisdom of a small-town officer. Grabbing me by both shoulders as he would a sack of coal he headed for a call box a half block away. On the way over he found time to threaten to crack my head with his stick; to point out what a hard-boiled character I was, and to inform me of his intention to have me "vagged." Above all else he wanted me to know that police of his town did not need a warrant to search my kind. Upon reaching his call box he surveyed me again. Being convinced after closer scrutiny that I was utterly exhausted for want of sleep, he warned me not to question the ways of officers when being searched, and promised to allow me to go on my way. He directed me to a Japanese restaurant across the street. That I took to be his parting instructions. I was soon to find out my freedom was only a parole. Upon coming out I found my friend the cop calling me back as I started toward the station. He wanted to point out what an easy job it would be for him to have me convicted for vagrancy. I mentioned my right to a trial by jury. He said my bail would be from three to five hundred dollars; no trial for thirty days or so.

Realizing my weakened condition and knowing the terrible brutalities committed by paid officers of the law upon defenseless men picked up at random, I struggled to control myself. I told him I had been an officer of the law once myself. I failed to inform him, however, how I had resigned after discovering that I would soon become wholly unable to sympathize with my own kind.

Finally I was permitted to resume my trip. Dragging my weary feet, homeward bound, I reflected on the difference of reception accorded me in that charming California town in October, 1917, and six years later.

Berkeley, California, April 30

J. E. S.

Hendrik van Loon will contribute an illustrated article on the Republican Convention at Cleveland to next week's issue of The Nation. There will also be reports by William Hard and Oswald Garrison Villard and drawings by Art Young.

Books

A Great Liberal Leader

The Life of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. By J. A. Spender. Houghton Mifflin Company. $10.

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD was not the first man to make his way through storms of contumely and abuse to the highest office in the state. Campbell-Bannerman, too, was for many years the best-hated man in England. His denunciation of the farm burnings and concentration camps of the Transvaal War as "methods of barbarism" exposed him to unceasing torrents of vituperation, and even as late as a few months before he became prime minister it was commonly held to have made it impossible for him ever again to hold public office. But it was those three words that in the end brought about peace and union in South Africa. Eight years after they were uttered General Botha told Mr. Spender that when the Boers were fighting a losing battle with an apparently hopeless future before them the fact that the leader of one of the great English parties had had the courage to say this thing and to brave the obloquy which it brought upon him touched their hearts and made them think seriously of the possibility of reconciliation.

Campbell-Bannerman had held the premiership for little more than two years when failing health brought his career to a close. But during that brief period he wrote his name indelibly upon the history of the British Empire. The granting of responsible government to the Transvaal, one of the greatest acts of faith ever performed by a powerful nation, was his work, and it will cause his memory to be honored long after the exploits of many more brilliant men have been forgotten. All the way through the Boer War he insisted that the enemies of today would have to be the fellow-citizens of tomorrow, and his policy was consistently directed to the ultimate "conciliation and harmonious cooperation of the two European races in South Africa."

The statesman who rendered his country this priceless service was one of the most modest and least self-assertive of men, almost devoid of ambition. He strove for none of the prizes of public life. They came to him unsought and undesired. He described himself, quite sincerely, as "scared and saddened" when he realized, from a talk with King Edward at Marienbad, that the time was rapidly approaching when he would be the First Minister of the Crown. "It has not been by my seeking," he told a Montrose audience during his premiership, "that I am where I am, but simply because I have gone straight forward and find myself there without knowing very well how I came there." He never trimmed his sails to catch a popular breeze.

He held the simple view of the party system [says Mr. Spender] that when the country wanted Toryism it would go to Tories for it, and when it wanted Liberalism it would expect the unadulterated article from a Liberal party. For Liberals, therefore, to try to appease popular wrath by assimilating themselves to Tories when the country was against them was an unprincipled folly which would destroy their chance of being accepted as Liberals when the popular mood changed.

Sooner or later there comes a time when a war-intoxicated nation sobers down, and then it gives its confidence to those who have preserved their sanity amid the general delirium.

The tributes so often paid to the "simplicity" of Campbell-Bannerman's character tend, perhaps, to produce the impression that his intellectual endowment was second-rate. That conclusion, however, would do him a grave injustice. Even his speeches, though lacking the sparkle of Rosebery's or Winston Churchill's, abounded in pungent comments and vivid phrases. It is to him that we owe the coining of the neat term "Ulsteria" to express the excited mood of northeastern Ireland. It was no mediocrity who wrote for the Balfour Government the epitaph: "They have lived for some years on nothing but tactics, and now they have died of tactics." Nor could the land policy of English Liberalism be better summed up than in the words: "We wish to make the land less of a pleasure-ground for the rich and more of a treasure-house for the nation." There was one utterance of Campbell-Bannerman's that reached the level of inspiration. On the very morning when he was to address the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which included a special delegation from Russia, there came the news that the Duma, after ten weeks of existence, had been abruptly suspended by imperial ukase. This announcement cut right across his carefully prepared speech, and set him a problem as difficult and delicate as ever diplomat had to solve. After disclaiming any qualification for judging the Czar's act, he remarked that new institutions had often a disturbed, if not a stormy, youth. "The Duma," he continued, "will revive in one form or another. We can say with all sincerity, 'La Douma est morte: Vive la Douma.'" The effect was electrical. The gloom which the morning's news had cast over the audience was instantly dispersed by this battle-cry of hope.

In Mr. Spender, who was for many years closely associated with him and who was the ablest exponent of his policies in the London press, Campbell-Bannerman has found an ideal biographer. The book, one must add, has the advantage of a marvellous index.

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Two Poets and a Novelist

Sunrise Trumpets. By Joseph Auslander. With an Introduction by Padraic Colum. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The Crimson Cloak. By Lois Montross. Boni and Liveright. $1.75.

The Dark Night. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.

ONE of the several qualities that seem in modern times to be essential to poetry is the quality of movement—movement not of the story, for stories are seldom told, but movement in the language, in the line. The reader may be taken fast or slow; he may even be held quite still, in a peculiar suspense; yet there must be felt, somewhere beneath or behind the words which the poet uses, a pull. If one is not drawn on a new and powerful current of some sort the chances are that one is not reading verse. Good verse has always possessed this power; poetry must possess it today or go without an excuse for existing. It is fully as important as that quality oftener talked about, the quality of vision. All persons may see, while only a few can talk so felicitously that their words, their phrases, their sentences slip round and after one another like streams of wind or layers of rain.

Mr. Auslander is clearly a poet if the foregoing holds true. He may get much or little said; he may fail to interpret human life in new terms; but he is gifted with an artist's love and skill when it comes to the rhythmic manipulation of English words. Incidentally, it is the movement of wind and rain that he suggests; wind and rain—subtle, slanting, soft—are the elements which he has chosen in the first half of his accomplished volume to create upon the page. Twilight swishes through his diction; gray water seeps up and muffles his cadences without once destroying them. He has a mannerism. He, too, much loves to load his verse with telling phrases—and then it is as if the stream died for a while in dead, soaked leaves. Most of the time, however, he is in control of his method, and the reader gets such passages as these:

Roads are rutted and old wagons
Lumber and lunge on sunken stones;
The rain at a thousand gusty flagons
Gurgles and groans.

* *

The drowsy, friendly, comfortable creak

Of axles arguing and wet spokes gleaming,
When old empty tumbrels blunder dreaming, too sleepy to speak,
Blunder down the road in the rain dreaming. . . .

There is a sudden fuss of draggled feathers and the swing

Of winds in a hissing burst of raindrops; then a cry
Of color at the hill's rim; a strange bright glimmering;
And a lark talking madness in some corner of the sky.

Mr. Auslander is perhaps less successful in the second half of his volume, where he deals with human subjects in strict forms of verse—for instance, the sonnet. Yet in his sonnet on Yseult and in half a dozen other pieces he is brilliantly eloquent because he carries over the finer technique of his poems about nature. Much may be expected of his future volumes.

Mrs. Montross has written some love poems which are better at the first than at the second reading. Their note is an intense one, and their inspiration is doubtless true; but a certain over-neatness about their conclusions, a finality of touch, robs them of their full effect. The greatest love lyrics have been great chiefly in their beginnings—perhaps only in their first lines. Their authors have been content to let them trail off, never hoping to say the last word about an experience which has no end in fact. Much modern poetry about love degenerates into epigram because the writers believe that a point must somehow be made; whereas love poetry lacks a point. Mrs. Montross shows most promise in those long philosophical pieces which allow her remarkable fluency of speech to work its way. In Runners, for example, Youth and Night and Death race downhill with the runner man:

Faster, with slack limbs
Faster, with tense limbs
Whichever way—faster.

There is no finish to the race, and so no finish to the poem. It is to be hoped that Mrs. Montross continues thus to look at life in motion, for that, reduced to words, is poetry.

Miss Sinclair, the author of novels in prose, remains a novelist in prose throughout the present tale in spite of the fact that it is printed in uneven lines and is called free verse. She writes as always with beauty and speed, but her language never quite leaves the level ground; it is not verse. The theme of "The Dark Night" will be familiar to readers of Miss Sinclair. Upon the darkness of a solitary woman's mind bursts for a moment the light of love. Her lover—unreal and pretty, like many of Miss Sinclair's heroes—deserts her side; darkness closes in again for a time; and peaceful brightness returns only when she can forgive him and tend him in the blindness which has smitten him. The story as told is pitiful, though it is not tragic. But what is more pertinent here, Miss Sinclair never attains in as many as five pages the rare and essential poetry which Mr. Auslander knows how to attain in a line and a half.

MARK VAN DOREN

Extra Muros

My University Days. By Maxim Gorki. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THESE Russians are irritating fellows! Not satisfied with the bewilderment that their tragic moods have caused in Occidental minds, they further confuse us when joking. Now this fellow, Gorki, who attended the university only in the capacity of a baker's boy delivering rolls—and occasionally billets-doux or secret revolutionary notes—of a morning entitles a volume "My University Days" to the extreme annoyance of serious-minded reviewers who, like Mr. Blackmar, express their indignation by announcing that "one seldom gets more than the barest of glimpses of the university he attended; the rest is made up of his endless confabulations with obscure and disreputable friends." There ought to be a law passed, and that's a fact, to make these fellows print the contents and net weight of their books in the title.

Those who seek a discussion of Russian university life, curricula, and academic figures, such as one finds in Herzen's Memoirs, will undoubtedly be disappointed. The book is a chronicle of that period in Gorki's youth which is normally the time of Studentenjahre. But Gorki had neither the means nor the preliminary education to enter the university. For him, university life consisted in haphazard contacts with the poorer students, in chance borrowings of books, and in the atmosphere of intellectual interests and discussions which penetrated even to his group of waifs. It is the period when the author works his way out of the dark chrysalis of mute manual toil into that brilliant freedom of creative activity.

Gorki writes not of students and teachers but of the cruel, starving peasants and their stupidities, of the baker and his succession of mistresses, of the revolutionary and his disciples. The university town is a center to which he returns occasionally but he spends his time on the Volga River, in the fields, and at the counter of the country store. He traverses hundreds of miles and meets thousands of people. It is all as inchoate as the passing of a crowd but, here and there, is a memorable incident and an unforgettable figure.

Undoubtedly that "weird, gay hole 'Marussovka'" in which Gorki spent his first days at Kazan is the prototype for his scene in "The Lower Depths." ". . . I walked about the passages and corners of 'Marussovka' watching how lived all these people who were new to me. The house was thickly crowded with them and resembled an ant heap. It was impregnated with sour, corrosive smells and in all corners were concealed heavy shadows, hostile to people. From morning till late at night the house droned, the sewing machines of the seamstresses rattled without interruption, the operetta singers tried their songs, the student practiced his scales with his bass voice, a drunken, half-mad actor loudly repeated his part, prostitutes shouted hysterically and tipsily. . . ."

Then Gorki describes the individuals and one will find here many of the characters and situations which he subsequently used in his tales. The volume is a colorful panorama which will fascinate every lover of life.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Shelley in France

Percy Bysshe Shelley. Odes, Poèmes et Fragments Lyriques Choisis. Translated, with an Introduction, by André Fontainas. Paris: Librairie Garnier. 5 francs.

Quelques Poèmes de Shelley. Translated in Prose and Verse by Paul Baillère. Paris: Bosse. 3 francs 50.

Proserpine and Midas. Two Unpublished Mythological Dramas by Mary Shelley. Edited, with an Introduction, by André Koszul. London: Humphrey Milford. 3s. 6d.

Ariel, ou la Vie de Shelley. By André Maurois. Paris: Grasset. 7 francs 50.

M. FONTAINAS has felt the charm of Shelley's verse even if he has not always been able to communicate it to the reader. It is unnecessary to give here passages in which M. Fontainas and M. Baillère have succeeded in their difficult and delicate task. These will be found on every page of their little books. Let us offer rather a few instances from well-known passages in which M. Fontainas, for example, could not have succeeded even if he had been more gifted than he is. These will enhance the value of those where he has been more fortunate.

"O Wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being," the opening words of the Ode to the West Wind, M. Fontainas translates: "O sauvage vent d'ouest," thus losing, to go no further, the alliterative charm of the line. The very title of The Sensitive Plant is weakened and made commonplace in its French form by dropping of the equivalent of the word

"plant." It becomes simply La Sensitive, which may also mean, as in English, a nervous woman. And in this poem the well-known line: "Till they die of their own dear loveliness," shrinks to "Jusqu'à mourir de leur propre, cher amour." I would venture to suggest to M. Fontainas that he substitute for the last word beauté, as amour has become a sort of byword in the French-speaking world. "Hail to thee, blithe spirit!" becomes "A toi salut, esprit joyeux!" Blithe when compared with joyeux—think of the Bataillons d'Afrique, mon cher Fontainas!—differs as do grub and food. The three opening verses of the fragment, The Isle, are:

There was a little lawny islet
By anemone and violet,
Like mosaic, paven.

In French this has to read:

Il y avait un petit flot en pelouse
D'anémones et de violettes
Comme en mosaïque couvert.

This very instance of the use of "lawny" has not escaped Murray's readers and will be found as an "illustration" in the Oxford Dictionary, while "paven," the same authority tells us, is "chiefly poetic"; whereas pelouse and couvert can recall the race course and the restaurant if one wishes.

Professor Koszul's two hitherto unpublished mythological dramas form an interesting little volume, especially as it brings to the fore again the scholarly and pleasing personality of the editor, perhaps the best authority in France on Shelley. While studying at Oxford, he prepared two books on the poet and an edition of his works for Everyman's Library, and at the present moment the Renaissance du Livre has in press another and smaller selection from Shelley which he translated for their "Collection des Chefs-d'Oeuvre Etrangers."

Speaking of his latest Shelley book, "Proserpine and Midas," Professor Koszul writes:

These two dramas reveal an unknown, unsuspected side in Mary Shelley's literary ambitions and they are a curious witness to that renewed interest in classical literature which is to be seen in the very heart of the English romantic movement.

Referring, in this same note, to M. André Maurois's "Ariel," M. Koszul says:

Of course it is the great French book on Shelley. His life, looked upon as matter for a novel, makes wonderful reading; and Maurois's style is enchanting. But I am afraid he has succumbed to the temptation of making Shelley even more eccentric and paradoxical than he really was, and he is apt to put the worst possible construction on every incident in the poet's life. But it is a remarkable piece of work.

And here is what Maurois says of himself and his book in a recent letter:

I started writing during the war and have published three volumes besides this one. For ten years I was revolving in my mind the thought of writing a Life of Shelley, for it seemed to me that this struggle of an idealist with the real facts of our existence is, after all, the great tragedy for most of us—"le roman de tous les intellectuels." And when I finally set to work at my task, I wrote the book as I would have written a novel and found that no life had been better constructed by fate to make a well-built story. At first I had thought of using Byron's life in this way. But it does not lend itself so well to this purpose. There are in it too many incidents followed by long periods where nothing happens, whereas in Shelley's existence there is one continuous chain of circumstances from beginning to end. For this reason my task was an easy one.

This turning of so many cultured Frenchmen toward Shelley calls for explanation, perhaps. Here is what M. Maurois says on this point in the letter already quoted from:

One cannot say that Shelley is widely read in France.

He is greatly admired by the few who can really understand him. But he will never be so popular as Byron, for whom there prevails at present a sort of craze, three books about his life appearing here simultaneously.

THEODORE STANTON

Problems of Society

Creative Experience. By M. P. Follett. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

READERS of Miss Follett's earlier book, "The New State," will recall the alertness of thought with which she probed the forms of association now competing in political theory. Her scrutiny was exhilarating to follow, for her concern was with something truly momentous: a possible technique of human relations by which association could be made to realize a maximum of democratic development. In the present book she has set herself resolutely about this quest.

To some it will be disconcerting that she should seek the initial cue from psychobiology and physiological psychology. Yet there is a presumption that life is continuous in its modes, and that a life-process which is clearly discernible on the infra-personal level will afford at least fruitful analogies on the personal and social levels. Miss Follett's study of Holt, Bok, Kempf, and Köhler yields three working-concepts for grasping the nature of experience itself as unfolding life-process. These are the conceptions of "circular behavior," of "integrative purposing," and of the "total situation." The greater part of the book is devoted to testing them out as categories of the social imagination.

The idea of circular behavior makes a clean break with our habit of imputing the roles of cause and effect separably to "subject" or "object" in experience. If, as Bok shows, the reflex arc is the path of stimuli received in consequence of the organism's own activity, then "response" is at once cause and effect, and the individual and its environment become interdependent agencies within a field of change. Our thought of control, therefore, for the web of self and circumstance should be neither the evangelical notion of a soul rising to mastery nor the scientific notion of "adjustment," but an engineering notion that treats the "activity-between" of self and setting as the creative area of experience.

The idea of integrative purposing delivers us from the intellectualist habit of viewing purposed ends as static value-patterns toward which our present activities are the mechanical means. Our present activities are dynamic with desire; their interadjustings are expressive of cross-purposes; and their outcomes are ends into which the means have wrought an unbidden will of their own. On the social level conflicts of purpose exhibit all the possibilities of fortune that the Freudians have studied on the personal level: dissociation, domination and repression, integration. The striking aspect of social integration is the increment of value that it achieves as compared with majority domination and with compromise. For example, the executive committee of a cooperative marketing association finds itself divided on the question whether or not to prosecute farmers who in alarming numbers have been selling to outside distributors in flat violation of their contracts. A majority of the committee members are for prosecuting—for obvious reasons. But a strong minority are opposed. They point out that there are many extenuating circumstances not apparent at a distance, that local sentiment will side with the farmer as against the headquarters law-office, and that the prosecutions will cost the cooperative more in ill-will than they achieve in discipline. The decision takes the form not of registering the majority will for general prosecutions, nor of scaling it down to a compromise number, but of creating, throughout the territory of the cooperative, local committees that shall in-investigate each its own local violations, so that the head office shall prosecute only where the offender's local fellow-cooperators so recommend. This decision not only gives each faction what it really wants: it gives rise to something that both acclaim as the release of new resources for their enterprise. The local committees, in fact, do more than merely sift cases for prosecution; their activities serve as an educational campaign, bringing home to their local groups the real meaning of cooperation. Here, then, is the increment of value, an end created by activities which are consciously addressed only to other ends.

This brings us to the problem of the unit of control. If our technique of human relations is to deal not with souls nor with circumstances but with "activities-between," we shall need to know just how much of the interactive field we are to span in "facing a situation." The idea of the "total situation" here signifies the area that is mobilized to achieve the increment of value just spoken of. As the unit of experience it is a functional and evolving whole.

Such, in bald summary, are the formative conceptions which this book brings to bear on the criticism of life. Their import lies in their implications of a method by which the full integrity of individuals shall be at one with social progress. This is brought out in brilliant chapters on the place of the expert in experience, on representation, and on the legal order. The book is indispensable to all who, realizing that the problems of society are problems of power, are concerned to see power cooperatively generated and not coercively imposed.

A. D. SHEFFIELD

A Layman in the Field of Art

None So Blind. By Albert Parker Fitch. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IT is a unique function of the artist to remove the film with which man instinctively and unconsciously coats his sensibilities as a protection from the multiplicity of sensations constantly impinging on them—his generalization to the effect that the sky is a curtain of blue, that grass is green, that love is a searing, cleansing flame and death a passing on. Some Monet comes with a new way of seeing sunlight, some Proust puts love under a microscope. But after the first shock of surprise men accept the new revelation and turn it also into a convention under which their sensibilities again grow stagnant and unhealthy, so that a new generation of artists must devote itself to destroying the Monet sunlight and Proust's love.

Dr. Fitch is a layman in the field of art. When he tells us that a girl's hand lay in her lover's like a little fluttering bird we remember in extenuation that most men are singularly insensitive outside their own habitual preoccupations, and that in this case a distinguished educator has mastered only a few stops of the instrument of his ideas. He sees and feels many of the current sights and emotions that can be perceived and felt within the current conventions of sight and feeling. He sums up for people the things they already know but may not be able to express, a popular faculty which in this case has sold four editions of his book within a month of its publication.

It is edifying to see a learned dean covering the same field recently exploited by so many undergraduates, and to have him restore for us the venerability of an institution at which they have been thumbing their noses. We rejoice to find solid worth bountifully rewarded, even to the point of marriage with the daughter of the Canadian Prime Minister. Many nice boys struggling to live up to our traditional morality will be grateful for Dr. Fitch's sympathetic tolerance of Dick Blaisdell's hard-fought victory over his natural impulses to break loose and paint the town red. And many Middle Western youths who have been dismally lost at Cambridge will chuckle over the Showing-up of Beacon Bill. New York may be a trifle surprised to find itself regarded as a modern, get-rich-quick movie settlement. Still, its typically crude and unlettered son is cast for the role of hero.

Within the limitations indicated "None So Blind" is a sincere and frequently an intelligent book. While it doesn't accept the Emersonian theory of compensation, it does quote Emerson, Plato, Molière, and other classical authors frequently. The fact that the convention it celebrates is a trifle old will make it all the more welcome to the large body of solid readers who deprecate license and whose religion has survived psychological research, the latest and subtlest of its foes.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Fascism

Rome or Death, the Story of Fascism. By Carleton Beals. The Century Company. $2.50.

Fascism. By Odon Por. Alfred Knopf. $2.75.

Mussolini as Revealed in His Political Speeches. Selected, translated, and edited by Baron Bernardo Quaranta di San Severino. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

NOT enough appreciation has been given to the excellence of Mr. Carleton Beals's book on the story of Fascism. I think his method of approach is the true method; and the picture he gives, if it might be retouched here and there, is the true picture. Italy was left at the end of the war in a state of pure flux, with all the normal canalizations of life disturbed if not wholly broken down. The Italian people was a plastic social mass in which any organized force could go a certain distance; and if it spent itself in the end, its exhaustion was due to its own incoherences rather than to any opposition offered it. The Fascista "drive" to power was only one of several that could be mentioned. The "drive" of the steel men "from the Right" in the direction of a centralized finance and a plutocratic oligarchy had its day of promise. The proletarian "drive" encountered, in the seizure of the factories, only the obstacle of its inner fatuity. If at any one of a number of moments a militaristic dictatorship (on the model of Hungary or Spain) did not emerge in Italy that was due to lack of cohesion and ambition inside the military machine. D'Annunzio happened to be a man of imagination rather than a politician; he led his men in pursuit of the phantom Fiume rather than toward the substantial Rome or Milan. Don Sturzo was an intriguer in committee rather than a field general; otherwise the Catholics might have established a black republic by driving for power instead of for parliament. The event proves that Mussolini was the only man capable of discarding all formulas and far-sighted enough to see realities where other would-be leaders were suffering from one or more illusions. The task of gathering all these lines together and showing the pattern they form as the Fascista "drive" advances through them is a complicated and difficult one. It is this task that Mr. Beals has done so surpassingly well.

However, one may study a political situation by following a given tendency to the end or by looking at it from the viewpoint of the obstacles that impede, condition, or distort that tendency. Mr. Beals is more interested in the whole picture of Italian life than in the intimate essence of Fascism. Here his book can be profitably supplemented by reading the volume of Odon Por, a young Russo-Italian, like Mr. Beals educated "on the Left" and, again like Mr. Beals, struggling hard to conceal a bias toward the Left. Odon Por has, for example, the virtue of stressing important influences in Fascism which Mr. Beals seems never to have detected. Since 1904 the aggressive element in Italian politics of the Right has been nationalism; and Italian nationalism is nothing but a political formulation of the theories of Wilfred Pareto as to the constitution of states by the succession of "élites," or "ruling classes." Mussolini is explained by Pareto, just as Lenin is explained by Sorel; and the pre-eminence which I believe must eventually be conceded to Mussolini over Lenin is the pre-eminence of Pareto over Sorel. Perhaps Odon Por has overdone the Paretan element in Fascism by actually giving us a Paretan interpretation of Fascism. And this is a rather serious defect in method; for it tends to make Odon Por's book a demonstration of a sociological theory. Odon Por has hit, meantime, on some brilliant and illuminating phrases. His adoption of Paretan terminology for "centrifugal" and "centripetal" forces in social movements is particularly convenient in simplifying the confusion in which Fascism developed. So his phrase of "functional democracy" helps to draw just that distinction which separates Italian democrats who approve of Mussolini and American democrats, for instance, who cannot swallow Mussolini's contempt for ballot boxes.

The fact remains meantime that truly objective analyses of current political events seem to come only from "oppositions." All that people on a band-wagon seem able to say for themselves is that the band-wagon is a very virtuous place to be. This is the only comment, really, that the Baron di San Severino deserves for his edition and translation of Mussolini's speeches. Any speeches of Mussolini are worth reading as "documents" for studying Mussolini's reactions to the various problems, little and big, that have confronted him in his checkered career. So these sixty speeches, more or less, are worth reading. But they have not been selected and annotated with a view to answering any of the serious questions that one may ask in connection with Mussolini. From his socialistic period, for example, we are given only that speech with which he withdrew from the Socialist Party. All the patriotic oratory he spent in connection with the World War arouses a tormenting itch to reread what, as a Socialist, he said about the Tripolitan War. In fact, the one sound principle for "editing" Mussolini, if a chronological "opera omnia" is impracticable, is to follow the trail of his contradictions. Is there a "principle" or a "policy" or a "doctrine" that he ever put forward without sooner or later repudiating it in favor of its opposite? The Socialist leader is the apocalyptic anti-Marx; the blasphemous atheist is also the high priest of counter-reformation; the inventor of "obstructionism" is the Nemesis of an "obstructionistic" parliament; the nationalistic fire-eater is the apostle of peace; the destroyer of organized labor is the creator of the "one big union"; and so on. One will never understand Mussolini without confronting his paradoxes honestly and fearlessly; an honesty and a fearlessness which he has himself but which are conspicuously absent from the maudlin sentimentalities of the philo-Fascisti—the Baron di San Severino among these. The feeling seems to be that an idol to be an idol must also be consistent. As a matter of fact, it is only through Mussolini's contradictions that his fundamental consistencies become apparent: his instinctive but increasingly self-conscious belief in the "nation"; his anti-parliamentarianism and his hostility to everything liberal democracy has stood for; finally the "political form" of his mind, which has enabled him to see on all occasions that the business of a politician is to succeed regardless of the platitudes, formulas, or parties he may use in trying to succeed. In Pareto Mussolini found the theories that satisfied his impulses and clarified his ideas. It is this "dialectical" process that is interesting in Mussolini. It strikes the eye even in the wholly inadequate anthology that the Baron di San Severino has made of his speeches.

Reverting to Mr. Beals's "bias" I must explain that it results in a fallacious stress on certain aspects of the Fascista revolution which has appeared also in Mr. Beals's articles in The Nation and in Current History. There, as in this book, Mr. Beals documents at great length Fascista violations of democratic principles (free speech, for instance) and Fascist "atrocities." In truth, the argument works both ways; for pro-

Fascista writers document just as fully the democratic heresies of Communism and the "atrocities" of the Socialists. Whether put forward by anti-Fascisti or pro-Fascisti these documentations are irrelevant: they prove simply that war exists, and they invite us to take sides in that war. They are, in other words, "propaganda" and not objective history. They mislead and never illuminate. They are samples of that historical "truth" which is really vital falsehood. Their irrelevance to scientific history is demonstrated by the fact that they need not even be true—as has been seen so clearly in the case of German "atrocities" in Belgium.

Wholly arbitrary, too, are the "judgments" which Mr. Beals decides to make on Fascism in the concluding pages of his book. Political situations are never good or bad—they simply "are"; that is to say, they are good for some people, or even for most people, but bad for others or even for a few people. When Mr. Beals says "Fascism has been blind, ugly, sinister" he says simply: "I am an American liberal"; just as when the Baron di San Severino says that Fascism is beautiful, noble, heroic he says simply: "I am not a critic." For a clarification of method it is essential to understand that the moral judgment figures in history only as "propaganda." For every point of arrival is a point of departure. The only social system that might be "judged" would be a fixed and stabilized Utopia. That is why a Utopia is a Utopia (or, at the best, a Scandinavia) and why Utopias are all so dull.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Books in Brief

The Sea. By James Oppenheim. Alfred A. Knopf. $5

A collection by Mr. Oppenheim of all his poetry which he wishes to preserve. Some of the earlier volumes are considerably reduced here, and the autobiographical poem "The Mystic Warrior" is distributed in sections throughout the book, which for the poet perhaps more than for any reader possesses an important unity. Much of this poetry indeed is of little worth; it is Walt Whitman without music, egoism without excuse. But The Song of Life, salvaged from "The Book of Self," is passionate and beautiful; and there are occasional passages elsewhere of great verse.

The Lure of Old Paris. By C. H. Crichton. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

Paris must indeed have something solid and enduring for our hearts since we continue to visit and love it in spite of the flood of books on its "lure," its "charm," its "spell," its "soul," and the Lord knows what else. This volume is neither better nor worse than the general run. It is fairly readable, mildly amusing, and occasionally enlightening, but there would seem to be no compelling reason for writing it except that Major Crichton wanted to bring out a book. That may be forgiven him—since there are worse vices than vanity—but why did he, or his publishers, make the lure less alluring by introducing into the volume a series of the most conventional and ordinary photographs?

Good Hunting. By Norman Davey. George H. Doran Company. $2.

There are half a dozen heroines in this novel—all remarkably alike. Most of them have "trops" of hair, more or less in disarray; one of them even uses a strand of it to dry her tears on. All of them are hunting a husband; they bait the trap for Julian Carr—an author. The procedure is always the same; they hurl themselves at his head in varying stages of physical revealment—and he ducks! The performance soon becomes wearisome, so that the hero's ultimate capture in the final pages of the story leaves one emotionally uninterested and more than a trifle bored.

International Relations Section

The German and French Elections

By ROBERT DELL

Frankfurt-am-Main, May 19

HAD the German general election followed the French instead of preceding it, its result might have been different. As it is, at the moment when France has moved to the Left and thus made real peace in Europe possible, the Nationalist reaction in Germany has won over nearly five million electors, and the parties of the Extreme Right, which were little more than a sixth of the late Reichstag, are just a third of the new one. These parties do not agree on every point, but their principal aims, openly avowed or not, are the same. They are the restoration of the monarchy, the revival of conscription and military discipline, the repudiation of the Treaty of Versailles, and an eventual war of revenge against France. There are 216 avowed monarchists among the 472 members of the new Reichstag, whereas among the 466 members of the Reichstag elected in 1920 there were 158. The right wing of the Catholic Center is also at heart monarchist, so the supporters of the restoration of the Hohenzollerns are quite half the Reichstag.

That the German general election would show a move to the Right was generally anticipated, but the result of the French election seems to have taken most people by surprise. The French election was fought outside Paris, as all French elections are fought, mainly on questions of internal politics. The great majority of the French electors, and in particular the French peasants, know little and care less about foreign policy, which they leave to the government in power. That is the chief reason of the apparent solidarity of the French people in support of M. Poincaré since he became Prime Minister. M. Poincaré has never been personally popular. Unlike M. Clemenceau, he is as destitute of wit as of a sense of humor; he is a dry-as-dust lawyer made of parchment and red tape. Clemenceau's power was due to the fear that he inspired; he was suspected of aiming at personal power in the state—a suspicion always fatal to a politician in France. M. Poincaré has fallen because he is essentially un-French; he is a typical Lorrainer, and the French do not like Lorrainers.

Poincaré was defeated even in Paris. Although the Bloc National has 22 of the 37 deputies for the City of Paris, it owes this majority to the eccentricities of the French electoral system. The Bloc National polled in round figures 185,000 in Paris; the Left Bloc (Radicals and Socialists) 147,000; and the Communists 135,000. The suburbs of Paris, which form a single constituency, returned five members of the Bloc National, five of the Left Bloc, and nine Communists, the respective polls of the three lists being 99,000, 92,000, and 105,000. In Paris and its suburbs M. Poincaré's foreign policy—and in particular the Ruhr policy—was the chief issue, and the electors declared against it by a majority of two to one. The fact that 27 per cent of the Parisian electors voted for the Communist Party indicates a revival of the revolutionary spirit of the Parisian workmen.

In the rest of France the election was to a great extent the old struggle of the spirit of 1789 against the Guard-room and the Sacristy. The recent increase of 20 per cent in all taxation was another important factor. The small rentiers have suffered most from deflation; all fixed incomes are reduced to a third of their original gold value. To the large number of people no longer able to live on what were formerly quite comfortable incomes 20 per cent additional taxation was the last straw.

No doubt there will be a change in French foreign policy—an immediate and radical change in its manner, which will be something, and a more gradual change in its methods and aims. The departure of M. Poincaré lifts a nightmare from Europe. Poland is perhaps the only European country where it is regretted; nowhere has it caused more secret satisfaction than in Belgium. Although on paper the Bloc National is still nearly half the Chamber, French politicians transfer their allegiance with great facility and M. Herriot, with a little ingenuity in forming his Cabinet, can bring into his majority certain groups whose principles are as vague as their titles. The Socialists are wise not to join the Government. That would deprive Herriot of the support of the moderate Republican groups, and it would play into the hands of the Communists.

Real peace in Europe depends, however, on Germany as well as France and the result of the German general election will not help to reestablish it. The "middle parties" have lost to both sides. The Socialist, the Democratic, the Centrum, and the German People's parties, which together formed the "Big Coalition" Government last August, won 368 seats out of a total of 466 in 1920; they now have only 238 seats in a Reichstag of 472 members. The Socialists lost the most heavily; they had 40 per cent of the total votes in 1920 and only 20 per cent this year. On the other hand, the Communists, who in 1920 polled 441,995 votes and won 2 seats, have increased their poll to 3,746,671 and have 62 members in the new Reichstag.

It would be a mistake to conclude from the success of the Communists that there is any immediate danger of "Bolshevism" in Germany. The German workmen are, however, becoming less docile. They revolt against the power which the German electoral system gives to the party machines, and against the bureaucratic methods of the Socialist leaders who for the last four years have persistently ignored the opinion of the rank and file of the party. They ignored it even in the matter of the selection of candidates for the general election. The German elector must vote for one of the party lists drawn up by the respective party caucuses and is obliged to vote for the whole list without striking out a single name. The party caucus thus decides which candidates will have the best chance of election. In most of the German constituencies the best chance was given to the "old gang" who have controlled the Socialist Party in the past. In Berlin, where the party officials overruled the Left list presented by the delegates from the rank and file, the Socialists lost 400,000—two-thirds—of their voters; half of these voted for the Communists and the other half mostly abstained.

In the last five years the Socialist leaders have done nothing but make blunders. The "Big Coalition" of last August was the crowning blunder. The vast majority of German workmen resented the participation of their leaders in a Government including representatives of a party with avowed monarchist principles. The Socialist members of the Stresemann Cabinet actually agreed to the recall of the Crown Prince to Germany and to the abominable invasions of Saxony and Thuringia which overthrew by force one labor government and crippled another. In his speech at Hanover on March 30 Mr. Stresemann boasted with reason that he had used the Socialists as catspaws.

The history of the German Majority Socialist Party has been a series of such betrayals. The Majority Socialists opposed the revolution up to the last moment, accepted it only when they were obliged to, and then succeeded in preserving most of the essentials of the old regime and keeping the revolution little more than a name. When the Kapp Putsch had been defeated by the spontaneous action of the workmen, Noske compromised with the defeated reactionaries, sabotaged the victory of Labor, and, when the workmen rose against his treachery, shot them down. For four years the Socialists were the predominant factor in the Government. They agreed to a tax policy which put nearly the whole burden of taxation on the workers, and used the employers to collect it by deducting it from the starvation wages. In March, 1923, this 10 per cent deduction from salaries and wages yielded 95 per cent of the whole receipts from the income tax. At the same time the employers were allowed to pay the state at monthly or even longer intervals, thus pocketing the greater part of the tax in consequence of the depreciation of the currency. Like the other parties in power, the Socialists persistently refused to make any effort to balance the budget, to stop inflation, and to stabilize the currency, or to make practical proposals for settling the reparations question.

Unless the leaders of the German Socialist Party profit by the rude lesson that they have received, the party will continue to decline and the Communist Party will become the German party of Labor. German Communism, if it ever got into power, would no doubt be very different from Russian Communism, but the German Communist Party has no leaders and Germany needs less state control rather than more. Germany needs more individualism today, and training in the use of personal liberty.

Probably the gains of the Extreme Right are also due less to Nationalist sentiment than to disgust with the "middle parties" that have been in power. The Fascists have not done so well as they or other people expected. Hitler's and Ludendorff's National Freedom Party has 32 members in the new Reichstag, and the German Social Party, patronized by the notorious Ehrhardt, has 4. But the German Nationalist Party has increased its strength from 66 to 95 and, as the 10 members of the new Agricultural League will sit and vote with it, it will be the largest party in the Reichstag.

The parties of the Extreme Right and the Communists agree in opposing the acceptance by Germany of the plan of the Dawes committee, but the German Nationalists are now finding their election pledges on this point inconvenient. They are determined to be in the Government and they cannot get a majority without the cooperation of the Centrum and the German People's Party, who will not work with them unless they accept the Dawes plan. On the other hand, the plan cannot be carried without the support of the German Nationalists, for certain essential parts of it involve a change in the German constitution and therefore require for their adoption a two-thirds majority of the Reichstag. At present the German National Party is torn in two by this question. Its leader, Dr. Hergt, would like to accept the plan, and he is supported by the big-business interests in the party who recognize that the Dawes plan lets them off very leniently. The Junkers are uncompromising. The Nationalists will try to insist on an internal policy so reactionary that it will be difficult for the Centrum, which includes a large number of Catholic workmen, to work with them in any case. They are quite capable, if thwarted, of forming a minority government, dismissing the Reichstag, and governing by force. Such a government would be a danger to Europe and would justify the worst fears of the French people.

The political situation in Germany is such as to make a violent clash of forces possible. The parties of the Extreme Right are flushed with their electoral successes and dream of achieving in the near future some at least of their aims. On the other hand, the workmen are still miserably paid and are working long hours—in many trades sixty hours a week and even more. Wages are less than half what they are in England. In the Ruhr a general strike is on, to recover the eight-hour day, and there have been similar movements in other parts of the country—one, the strike of the Hamburg dockers, was successful. A Right government would still further exasperate the workmen, who already feel that they have lost nearly all that they won by the revolution. They have been patient for five years, but there are signs—the heavy Communist vote is one of them—that the limits of their patience have been reached. In that case, with rabid reactionaries in power, there may be trouble ahead.

Europe's Reaction

I. The Attack on the Eight-hour Day

By SYLVIA KOPALD

ONLY four years, at the most, have passed since labor held the center of the post-war stage. The Triple Alliance, the German revolution, the Hungarian and Finnish revolutions, the Russian revolution, the seizure of the factories in Italy, the world-wide strike epidemic, and the new tone of labor demands gave some basis even in 1920 for justifiable speculation on "the outcome of the union offensive." The crisis of 1921 marked the complete ebb of that tide. Today labor is defeated, beaten back by a triumphant capitalist reaction, fighting to hold even that which was not questioned before the war. Enough facts have accumulated to permit an evaluation of this swing away from the left to the extreme right, to strike the debits and credits of reaction's balance sheet for the labor and employing groups.

On labor's side the balance lies heavily in the debit column. Probably the chief item of loss has been the general attack upon and attrition of the eight-hour day. For some years the offensive against this hard-won labor condition has been gathering increasing momentum. During the last few months the battles in at least eleven countries have gone to a decision.

Germany in this, as in all else, marks the low point of labor's losses. The first weeks of the German revolution saw the establishment of a legal eight-hour working day. Two orders issued by the National Office for Economic Demobilization on November 23, 1918, and March 18, 1919, decreed the eight-hour legal working day first for manual and, then, salaried workers. Exceptions were granted only under rigorous supervision. Early in 1922 August Thyssen and Hugo Stinnes announced to both the Government (Wirth Cabinet) and the National Economic Council their conviction that the eight-hour day must go. From that time on agitation toward that end has been conducted unremittingly by the employers' associations and press.

On the eve of its resignation the Stresemann Cabinet limited the effective life of the eight-hour decrees to November 17, 1923. Labor protested strongly against this abrogation of the existing law before a new law had been passed. But for more than a month Germany had no law on working hours, and many industries used this interregnum to institute the ten-hour shift. On December 21, 1923, the Marx Government, armed with the extraordinary powers specially conferred upon it by law, issued a new decree governing hours (effective January 1). This law expressly recognizes "the eight-hour day in principle," but permits so many exceptions to it in practice that the ten-hour day is fast becoming the standard working day in Germany. Technical reasons, general economic reasons, emergency work necessary to prevent deterioration of raw materials or products, maintenance work, loading work, etc.—all may be urged as grounds for an extension of the work-day to ten hours. Employers may cancel eight-hour contracts on thirty days' notice. And blanket permission for extension of the shifts is granted to an employer who obtains the consent of his workers to institute overtime for any 30 days of the year, applicable to seasonal and part-time industries as well as full year. The Government itself launched the practice of a longer day under this decree by instituting a 54-hour week for all federal employees. Private industry, favored by the industrial depression, has written the ten-hour day into the new working contracts.

In Italy, very similar devices are gnawing away the benefits of a law establishing the "eight-hour day in principle." On March 15, 1923, the Mussolini Government issued a decree (No. 692, effective August 10, 1923) which limited the hours of "actual work" of all workers to 8 per day and 6 days per week. This law was hailed in pro-Fascist circles as an indication of the social and humanitarian temper of the Government. However, "actual work" was applied only to that required by continuous or arduous occupations. Two decrees issued on September 10, 1923 (Nos. 1955 and 1956), to present detailed regulations for the enforcement of the law in industry and agriculture showed how wide the field of "exemptions" is. Technical and seasonal industries, repair, maintenance, supervision, etc., preparatory and accessory work, transportation, guards, clerks, and many others, are placed outside the law. Close to a hundred categories of workers are thus expressly exempted. In most cases the maximum work-day is set at 10 hours, although the "interested parties may otherwise agree."

The eight-hour law in France which was passed by the Clemenceau Government during May, 1919, after the May 1 demonstration, has suffered persistent attack from the employers since 1921. Special exemptions from the operation of the law have been granted and violations have been openly winked at. In industries where labor is poorly organized—and they are many—the law is practically a dead letter. Indeed its attrition has become so serious a fact that the General Council of the French Confederation of Labor gave prominent place in its election program of "minimum demands" to a significant insistence upon "the recognition of the eight-hour day."

The attack upon the eight-hour day in Austria began during February, 1924. The Alpine Montangesellschaft (Stinnes) refused to discuss a demand from its employees for a general wage increase because of the workers' flat refusal to consider an increase in working hours. Since that time the attempt to make new wage agreements conditional upon an acceptance of lengthened working shifts has become the employers' general tactic against the eight-hour day. The employers of Luxembourg, on recommendation of the president of the Federation of Industries and with the aid of the Government, adopted the same tactic during March. The workers, of course, are uniting solidly for opposition. But "temporary suspensions" of the eight-hour day have already been effected.

In Poland the battle is taking still another form. During January the Government embarked upon its policy of balancing the national budget and stabilizing the rates of exchange. This policy has necessitated the withdrawing of state credits for industrial purposes and has precipitated a sharp industrial depression. The employers have been attempting generally to utilize this depression as a justification for lengthening working hours. They are concentrating their attack upon Polish Upper Silesia where the Polish law establishing the 46-hour week has not replaced the German decree of 1918. Now that Germany itself has revoked this latter law, the Polish employers are clamoring for a Silesian copy of the new German model. The Polish Federation of Trade Unions, realizing that such a victory would imperil the Polish law, has decided to concentrate all its forces upon the defense of the eight-hour day. But it is openly aware "that our position is a very difficult one."

In Finland, the Government has acceded to the many recent demands of the employers for an abrogation of the eight-hour law by the issue of supplementary "exempting" decrees. By the end of 1923 the exemptions from the law had become so numerous that the Finnish Confederation of Unions addressed a petition to the Government requesting a limitation of exemptions to those special cases designated in the original law and the refusal of all other exemptions during 1924. The Government replied by issuing a new decree during February still further extending the field of exemptions. Among others, railroad, postal and telegraph, hospital and prison rural building, forestry and roads, and bridge workers have been added to those who may be excluded from the operation of the law.

Against this bleak story, the results of the attack upon the law in Belgium and Switzerland throw some gleams of light. During February the opponents of the law in Belgium brought a proposal for a modification of the existing Eight-hour-day Act before Parliament. The proposal was thrown out by a vote of 136 to 20 (13 members abstaining from voting). The Moyersoen Ministry, thereupon, itself offered a less drastic proposal. This was also defeated although more narrowly (97 to 66, 6 abstentions). The new Belgian Minister of Labor, Tschoffen, who came in with the Cabinet replacing the Moyersoen Ministry, has pledged himself to an observance of the eight-hour-day act. On February 17, the Swiss nation made its first repudiation of the attack upon the eight-hour law in a referendum which gave a majority of some 116,000 against the proposed lengthening of the work shift (433,389 to 317,598).

Stirred by this world-wide attack the British Trades

Cooperative Apartments

Group erecting elevator apartments on Andrews Avenue, block south of New York University

Children's Playground—Tennis Court—Permanent South, East and West exposures

Subscriptions invited

Investment $475 per room. Rental $18 per room covers all expenses and 10% return on investment. Net average rental $11.90 per room. Paul Braude, 299 Madison Avenue, Vanderbilt 9481.

A BEAUTIFUL PLACE IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS FOR a WEEK-END or an EXTENDED VISIT 5th SEASON

Rates $7 a day and $37.50 a week. Address
E. G. Ohmer, Western View Farm, New Milford, Connecticut, 2½ hours from New York.
Telephone New Milford 163—Ring 2.

CAMP UTOPIA

Lake Ellis — Wingdale, N. Y.
A Vacation Ground for Grown-Ups
in the Berkshire Hills

120 minutes from Grand Central

WM. J. PERLMAN & DR. WILL DURANT
Managing Director Associate Director
Address 2000 Broadway, New York City
Telephone Columbus 2454 or Bensonhurst 0759

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N. Y.

A Camp for Adults

IN THE BERKSHIRES

Less than 3 hours ride from New York

OPEN FOR SEASON, JUNE 25, 1924
TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.

Rates $30 per Week—$6 per day

Address D. LEIKIN, 1056 110th Avenue, Bronx, N. Y.
Tel. Intervale 2667

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

in the Adirondacks

5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE

An ideal spot for rest and fun

Rates $25 per week. Accommodations limited to 25.
Fare for round trip to Lake George, $12.28.

For booklet, address Lena Barish,
Watkins 1281 21 Seventh Ave., N. Y. C.

THE RUSSIAN INN

33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.

LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER

Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

FARMS FOR SALE

Are you interested in rare bargains in the foothills of the Berkshires? Do you realize that prices for real farms and summer houses in Connecticut will never be as low again?
Address—Thomaston, care The Nation.

The Switchboard Comes to Life

Zero hour approaches. Wire chief and assistants are set for the "cut-over" that will bring a new central office into being.

In the room above operators sit at the new switchboard. Two years this equipment has been building. It embodies the developments of hundreds of engineers and incorporates the scientific research of several decades. Now it is ready, tested in its parts but unused as an implement of service.

In the terminal room men stand in line before frames of myriad wires, the connections broken by tiny insulators. Midnight comes. A handkerchief is waved. The insulators are ripped from the frames. In a second the new switchboard becomes a thing alive. Without their knowledge thousands of subscribers are transferred from the old switchboard to the new. Even a chance conversation begun through the old board is continued without interruption through the new. The new exchange provides for further growth.

This cut-over of a switchboard is but one example, one of many engineering achievements that have made possible a wider and prompter use of the telephone.

To-day, in maintaining a national telephone service, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, through its engineering and research departments, continuously makes available for its Associated Companies improvements in apparatus and in methods of operation.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

The Stenographic Ad Verbatim Report of
THE INTERNATIONAL DEBATE OF THE DAY! Just Published!
BERTRAND RUSSELL versus SCOTT NEARING
Introduction by SAMUEL UTERMAYER
Subject—RESOLVED: That the Soviet Form of Government Is Applicable to Western Civilization.
MR. RUSSELL, Negative MR. NEARING, Affirmative
Held in New York City May 25, 1924
THE LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION, 500 Fifth Ave. PRICE, $1.00 POSTPAID
Dept. N. New York

NEW ADDRESS: W. BEYER'S BOOKSHOP

From June 1st: 213 West 43rd Street
Just West of Times Square—Broadway

Large stock of German and American books
New and Second Hand

What do you think about an American Labor Party and the Tasks before It?

Come and join the discussions of the
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
at Belmar, N. J., June 25-28

Among the leaders will be Robert Morss Lovett, George Soule, Morris Hillquit, Scott Nearing, Stuart Chase, Horace Kallen, Norman Thomas, Senator Shipstead (probably) and John Brophy.

Write for particulars to the L. I. D., 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Union Congress recently ordered an investigation into the working hours of members of affiliated organizations. The results show that 3,500,000 workers have a 48-hour week and 800,000 a 42-hour week. Of the 15,000,000 British workers, some 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 enjoy the eight-hour day. In the United States we have seen not only the maintenance of the eight-hour day in many industries, but its institution in the steel industry, long the stronghold of the ten- and twelve-hour shifts.

Of these eleven representative countries, therefore, nine have witnessed an energetic offensive against the hard-won eight-hour day. In each of these nine the standard working day had been established by law. In six of them the eight-hour day has been either completely destroyed or seriously encroached upon; in one it is menaced; in two it has been maintained. In this item, the reaction has thus inflicted heavy losses upon labor.

(In two articles to be published in forthcoming issues, similar accountings will be rendered in the matters of wages and cost of living, working conditions and trade-union strength, and the new status of the employing class throughout Europe.)

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT HERRICK, author of "Waste," has just returned from the Caribbean.

GILSON GARDNER is Washington correspondent and special editorial writer for the Newspaper Enterprise Association and the Scripps newspapers.

CHARLES B. DRISCOLL is in charge of the editorial page of the Cleveland Press.

AGNES DE LIMA has for several years made a special study of modern methods of education.

HERBERT W. HORWILL, contributor for many years to The Nation, is returning to England after two years in the United States.

THEODORE STANTON, librarian at Rutgers College, has been until recently editor of the department of American literature of the Mercure de France.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON is on the staff of the Foreign Press Service.

ROBERT DELL is The Nation's correspondent in Central Europe.

SYLVIA KOPALD is the author of a recent book, "Rebellion in Labor Unions."

A. D. SHEFFIELD, of the faculty of Wellesley College, is acting as secretary to the committee on industrial relations of the National Conference on the Christian Way of Life.

ARTHUR GUTERMAN, author of "Light Guitar" and other volumes of verse, has for many years contributed Rhymed Reviews to Life.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is business manager of the World Tomorrow.

WILLIAM A. DRAKE has been until lately managing editor of Vanity Fair.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS will contribute an article on Law and Modern Marriage in The Nation's series on New Morals for Old.

PLEXO "TOILET LANOLINE"

—the year-round
skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

"The JOURNAL is now one of our really big magazines."
—Allen W. Porterfield.

THE MENORAH JOURNAL

June - July, 1924

A NOTE ON SPINOZA	Anatole France
RACIAL SUPERIORITY	Edward Sapir
HERZL'S DIARIES	Marvin Lowenthal
RECENT SCULPTURE (Art Insert)	Jacob Epstein
THE ART OF JACOB EPSTEIN	John Courvos
SPRING ON THE STEPPE (A Story)	Max Robin
AN OLD SONG (A Poem)	Yehoash
THE JEWS IN FRENCH LITERATURE	André Spire
THE LEGEND OF LUZ (A Play)	Harry Sackler
THE TRADITIONAL CODE OF JEWISH EDUCATION	David de Sola Pool
JEWISH ARTISTS OF THE SEASON	Louis Lozowick
LETTERS FROM ABROAD: LONDON, VIENNA, WARSAW.
NOTES FOR A MODERN HISTORY OF THE JEWS	E. E. C.
THE ADVERSARY'S NOTE-BOOK	H. Ben-Shahar

THE MENORAH JOURNAL,
167 West 13th Street, New York.

Please enter my subscription to The Menorah Journal for

Two years at $5.00

One year at $3.00 ☐

beginning with the next issue and sending me current introductory copy free.

Name

Address

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXVIII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 25, 1924

No. 3077

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	721
EDITORIALS:
The Case for Mr. McAdoo	724
What Do You Read?	725
Aliens?	725
The Critical Scene	726
THE NORDIC JUBILEE. By Hendrik Willem van Loon	727
COO WITH COOLIDGE. By William Hard	729
THE CONVENTION OF THE FIT-TO-RULE. By Oswald Garrison Villard	730
A PACIFIST GENERAL. By Mollie Best	732
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Modern Love and Modern Fiction. By J. W. Krutch	735
AT THE FRONT. By Art Young	737
ANOTHER WAR VICTIM. By Ida Treat	738
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	739
CORRESPONDENCE	740
BOOKS:
McAdoo, Plunger. By Harry Elmer Barnes	741
Creative Criticism. By Floyd Dell	741
The Revolt in the Unions. By Benjamin Stolberg	742
A Middle-Georgia Pioneer. By Julia Collier Harris	743
Patterns. By J. W. Krutch	743
Turkey Through the Eyes of a Turk. By Albert Howe Lybyer	744
Books in Brief	745
DRAMA:
Emanuel Reicher	745
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Superpower in Switzerland. By Paul Lewinson	746
The Press in the Soviet Republics	748

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY Irita van Doren

MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON

NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE NOMINATION OF CHARLES G. DAWES for Vice-President on the ticket with Calvin Coolidge is eminently fitting. If there is a rotary club or a chamber of commerce in America whose members are not swooning with joy at this beatification of big business in the person of Mr. Dawes, we should like to know which it is. No other man so well personifies the opposition of big business to union labor. We don't see how anybody could have slapped the face of the American Federation of Labor more deliberately. The organizer of the Minute Men of Chicago, an anti-union organization, and one of the leaders in the so-called "American plan" to break the unions, General Dawes's recorded public utterances bristle with the most damaging statements for the Democrats to blazon from coast to coast. Indubitably he will put "punch" into the campaign, also coarseness and vulgarity. But he is one of those hammer-and-tongs speakers who are likely at any moment in a campaign to let loose a damaging "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" sentence without any idea of the harm that it will do. He is passionate, picturesque, vigorous, and vivid, extremely able, and devoted in his loyalties. But he will appeal only to the narrowest business circles.

QUITE IN KEEPING with the two divergent views as to Calvin Coolidge is the similar difference of opinion as to the outlook for the Coolidge-and-Dawes ticket.

The Eastern business world believes that Mr. Coolidge will win hands down; it thinks the contest will be a walk-over. As to that, much depends upon nominations made by the Democrats in New York. Since we take the third-party movement seriously, we cannot see at this stage how Mr. Coolidge can win. Prophecy at the outset of the campaign is usually idle. We wish, however, to call the attention of our readers to a factor of enormous importance in the coming campaign—to the growing industrial distress. Nothing more significant took place at Cleveland than the publication during the convention of the brief item of news that the unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation have touched a lower figure than at any time since 1914. Unless we miss the mark the Republicans will be pointing shortly to a half-filled dinner pail and declaring that there should be no change of policy when times are so bad; that the Republican Party is always the one to restore prosperity. To a brilliant English woman one of the cleverest and most unscrupulous of British politicians remarked when he was asked why the Conservative Party had just taken the extraordinary step of reappointing as its leader Mr. Stanley Baldwin: "Well, we must not swap donkeys while crossing the stream!" The same appeal will be made here, albeit in different language. But with the prospect of a million unemployed, the President will certainly achieve the most notable victory on record if he carries his party to victory in November.

GASTON DOUMERGUE'S ELECTION as President of France is an indication that the liberal bloc is not so wholeheartedly liberal as it might be. Doumergue nominally belongs to the Left; his first cabinet post was in the radical Combes Ministry of 1902. But in the interim he has become a colorless and almost professional office-holder. He was in the Sarrien, Clemenceau, and Briand cabinets before the war; he was Premier for a few months in 1913-14; he was Minister of the Colonies in the Viviani and Briand cabinets of 1914-16. Then he was sent to Russia where, in the closing year of the Czar's regime, he helped to negotiate the infamous secret treaties which parcelled out the German colonies and allotted the Left Bank of the Rhine to France. The conservatives were naturally ready enough to support him for the Presidency despite his Left tag; and enough of the Left Bloc, which had forced Millebrand to resign, deserted the more radical Painlevé to elect Doumergue. As President, however, he is a figurehead.

HERRIOT AS PREMIER will determine the new policy of France. His revocation of the decrees expelling 7,000 Germans from the Ruhr is excellent; we hope the deported Rhinelanders and citizens of the Palatinate will also be allowed to go home. Herriot established himself as a remarkably able and energetic administrator in a long term as Mayor of Lyons; but he has yet to prove himself as a politician. His appointment of General Nollet, former chief of the Interallied Military Mission in Berlin, as Minister of War was doubtless intended as a shrewd political gesture. Herriot is committed to the evacuation of the Ruhr, but he cannot afford to let Poincaré's adherents assert that he gave away that "guaranty" for nothing. The recent elections showed the strength of the German reactionaries, who would, of course, prefer to pay no reparations at all; and Herriot had to make it plain that his Government would insist upon the utmost possible reparations and hold to the disarmament provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. Nollet's appointment is such a warning. The Reichstag has, fortunately, voted a general indorsement of the Dawes Plan, and Stresemann's recent discussion of the reparation problem showed common sense. Germans, he said, did not admit sole responsibility for the war. But after all, Germany had lost the war, and the loser has to pay.

HAS MUSSOLINI gone too far? The news dispatches indicate that although the Italians are willing to tolerate a self-appointed thug as their ruler, they want him and his followers to be reasonable about the murders they commit. There are right and wrong ways to do these things; certain persons that may be picked as victims and others that would better be left alone. To pick a Socialist leader out of the Chamber of Deputies and deliberately make away with him seems to have annoyed a good many persons who have stomachached the rest of Fascism. By a fine show of words about justice and the sacrifice of a few henchmen Mussolini will doubtless save his face; but the moral seems to be that a dictator should be careful not to be too dictatorial.

WE AGREE WITH Frank D. Pavey, president of the Alliance Française in the United States and Canada, that Gaston Liebert, formerly French consul general in New York City and now director of the French Bureau of Information, should stop his misdirected undertakings in this country. Mr. Pavey, who was formerly a New York State senator, seems to have erred in holding Mr. Liebert responsible for a movement to commit all the French societies of New York City to the support of Governor Smith's presidential ambitions, but if it is true that Mr. Liebert styles himself "minister plenipotentiary"—when in fact he has no such status—then it is time that the new Government of France should call a halt on his activities. Indeed there is no reason why any bureau should exist here devoted to propaganda for French political interests. That sort of effort grew out of the war, and has now been abandoned by most other countries. Its continuance by France is likely to do her more harm than good. There is no place here for a "minister plenipotentiary" who has no recognized diplomatic standing. How so excellent an official as M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador in Washington, can permit this situation to continue is beyond our understanding.

JAMES J. DAVIS, Secretary of Labor, has revived his proposal for a law requiring the annual registration of aliens, and is advocating it now on the ground that it would help in the detection of aliens who smuggle themselves into the country across the Canadian or Mexican borders. To us its benefits in this regard appear to be nebulous. Mr. Davis realizes that it would be impracticable to check up such a registration, and does not propose any police supervision of it. Hence about the only discoveries of failure to register would occur when persons were arrested or otherwise came into contact with the law. This would catch only a small percentage of the aliens illegally in the country. On the other hand, the scheme would put a needless burden of annoyance and expense—the cost would be paid out of fees—upon our foreign population and supply the basis for a meddlesome and tyrannical espionage. A previous bill for the registration of aliens proposed the dangerous plan of using the public schools for the work. Mr. Davis does not directly suggest this method. He would put the burden primarily on the Naturalization Bureau, but, appreciating the magnitude of the job, he would extend it to what the press dispatches call "interested individuals and organizations"—actually a lot of our bumptious and injudicious "Americanizers." What the alien most needs just now is a generous measure of letting alone.

"WAR—MODERN WAR between civilized peoples—does not just happen," says a circular of the Emergency Foreign Policy Conference of 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, a newly born organization for the purpose of supplanting the present American course of drift and grab with a progressive program beneficial both to other nations and to the United States. War begins a long way back of ultimatums, in conflicting greeds and mutual misunderstanding, the circular goes on to say, and likewise peace must be organized—must be builded by a foreign policy of justice, intelligence, and cooperation.

It is to see to it that our foreign policy is based on humane and statesmanlike principles that the Emergency Foreign Policy Conference has been organized. Not just to insist upon full information concerning the nation's foreign affairs, but to help to formulate the nation's foreign policy. Not just to favor a single forward step in international relations, but to conceive and support a continuous, progressive foreign policy. Not just to study international problems, but to organize and to act to solve them.

Representative John M. Nelson of Wisconsin is chairman of the new organization on whose executive committee are to be found numerous other of the country's progressive leaders. The movement is deserving of the widest support.

JAPANESE ON THEIR ISLANDS and we on our continent, each expressing our racial prejudices! That is about what it comes down to. The Japanese exclude the Chinese and Koreans in much the same way and for much the same reasons that we exclude the Chinese, Koreans, and Japanese. It is human nature to protest exclusion, and the Japanese have found some peculiarly vivid and dramatic forms of protest, but the nation that delivered the twenty-one demands to China is in no position to shout quite so loudly and so piously now. The United States has been stupidly rude, and has shown that democratic control of foreign affairs (labeled domestic in this case) is no sure guaranty against Curzonesque methods. But the worst of it is that the whole question is left like an unexploded shell. It may become buried harmlessly in the sands of time, and then again somebody may stumble over it with unfortunate results.

SEPTEMBER 12 IS MOBILIZATION DAY. On that day a defense test will be held to drive home to us the problems of mobilization in case of war. It is planned to mobilize for one day the regular army, the National Guard, and the officers enrolled in the reserve units. The regular army and the National Guard, we are informed by a brigadier general, are as the Greeks who held the enemy at Thermopylae "until the citizens (you and me) can meet the enemy in force." Industry too knows its duties, according to another brigadier general. A careful survey has been made of the 700,000 items used in war which would be required to equip our army. The country has been divided into fourteen procurement districts, with officers assigned to each. Over 6,000 factories have been allocated, and each one knows exactly what would be required of it in case of a major emergency and at what rate production would be required. Forms of contracts have been prepared, dies and plans furnished, and each manufacturer is equipped to at once begin to turn out the required products when the order reaches him.

On the cost-plus basis or $30 a month?

WILL THE CHURCHES PROTEST? "There is scarcely a church group in the country but that has set its face against the whole business of making war," writes the Christian Century in protesting against Mobilization Day. Or will they piously agree with General Pershing's sophistries—"Religion and patriotism go hand in hand in a righteous war, and our nation will never engage in any other. To wage an aggressive war for greed or gain is un-Christian, but to refuse to serve in defense of our homes and our institutions is equally un-Christian." With Lincoln when he introduced his famous Spot Resolution relative to the origin of the Mexican war, we want to know the spot where homes and institutions are being threatened. Anyway, if religion and war have not been divorced, the United States Chamber of Commerce has declared that business and war have parted company. War is wasteful and opposed to the best business methods and is somewhat like cutting off our nose to spite our face. If the business men really convince themselves of that, the churches may find it easier to hold that all war is un-Christian.

ANOTHER BATCH of college graduates, some eager, some bored, has been launched upon an inattentive world; and the annual libation of baccalaureate advice has been poured over their young heads. The advice is probably more interesting as an indication of currents of thought in the academic backwaters of American civilization than for any effect it may have upon the collegians' lives. President Faunce at Brown unearthed a Bible text to fit the age of radio, and hailed the advent of a day when a hundred millions would "think together, feel together, and act as a single, corporate, irresistible force"—a terrifying thought to those who believe that civilization has been made by minorities and by thinkers in lonely garrets unprovided with aerials. Dr. Reiland at Dartmouth commented upon youth's "spirit of interrogation, imagination, and exaggeration" and feared that "the circumstances of life would prove narrowing and restrictive in their influence upon thought." It may well be; the lists of honorary degrees suggest that something has happened to the university presidents since they were graduated. Kenyon College this year gave Mrs. Harding the degree of Doctor of Laws; Columbia awarded the same degree to Andrew W. Mellon and to Adolph S. Ochs of the New York Times. That degree long since ceased to mean much more than a tribute to money or to power. Columbia has granted it to King Albert, General Pershing, Henry P. Davison, and Count Bernstorff; Harvard to Marshal Joffre, Prince Henry of Prussia, and J. Pierpont Morgan; Colgate to the editor of the Saturday Evening Post; Chicago to William McKinley and Marshal Foch; and Pennsylvania to the Kaiser, the King of Italy, Edward VII, Bernstorff, and John Wanamaker.

WHAT CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS was seeking in 1492—a new and direct route to the East—was realized in 1914 when American engineers completed a narrow cut through the Western Hemisphere and permitted the ships of the world to pass through. The tenth anniversary of the opening of the Panama Canal to commerce will occur on August 15, and, as if to demonstrate the rightness of its existence, the waterway last year surpassed its rival at the Isthmus of Suez in the amount of shipping which it bore from one ocean to another. The World War, the most destructive event of this century, opened a couple of weeks before the Panama Canal—perhaps the most constructive undertaking—and during its course largely prevented the organization of new trade routes to profit by the waterway. Only 4,000,000 tons of shipping passed through the canal in 1915, the first full year of operation. By 1920 this had increased to only 10,000,000 tons, but by 1923 the tonnage had jumped to 24,737,000, surpassing that of the Suez Canal, which was 22,730,000. The net operating profit of the Panama Canal last year was $13,299,292. This does not mean that the waterway is earning money for Uncle Sam, because it cost nearly half a billion dollars, the interest upon which at 4 per cent would come to twenty millions. At the rate at which traffic is growing, however, this amount may be realized shortly, and meanwhile the canal is realizing the dream of Columbus, with a sweep and a magnitude of which he could not faintly conceive.

A DISHONEST NIGHT'S WORK for a dishonest night's pay." With this motto emblazoned on their pennants—which they keep, however, in a dark corner of the hold—the rum-runners of the southern Jersey coast have gone on strike. If the reports which reach us of working conditions in this hazardous industry are only half true, one should prepare for a prolonged struggle. These brave men, we understand, receive only $1 per case for the liquor they bring ashore through the dark waves while their brothers further up the coast receive $5; and in a single night they can transport only a few hundred cases in their sturdy little boats. As they say themselves in their simple, homely way:

We go out . . . and we get the stuff and start back. We're fired on and if we're close pressed very often the cases go overboard. If we come back empty-handed we get no pay at all. The men we're working for never even have their names mentioned. We get it all. It's worth a dollar more a case, and we'll get it or no stuff comes in.

Besides this, there are pirates who own sturdy little boats, too, and who prey on the brave rum-runners and who carry guns. It is a hard life. But, as any leading Republican will tell you, it is the great public that suffers most when a strike comes. Why not a national board to mediate between the rum-runners and the bootleggers and commission merchants and financiers engaged in the business? It should have a permanent impartial chairman, and for this job we nominate Mr. Harry M. Daugherty, whose experiences and inclinations peculiarly fit him for the position, and who at present must have time to serve.

The Case for Mr. McAdoo

MUCH that is romantic colors William G. McAdoo's career; much that is typically American. Brought up in the South in that after-the-Civil-War desolation which molded some strong characters, Mr. McAdoo early joined the hegira of vigorous personalities to the comparative intellectual freedom and the business opportunities of the North. In New York he was undistinguished at the bar and made but a fair living while casting about for wider fields to conquer, in response to the urge of undoubted executive power and ability. That opportunity came when he took up the scheme for a railroad tunnel under the Hudson. The idea was not original with Mr. McAdoo; it would not have been feasible save for the genius of an engineer—Jacobs. But Mr. McAdoo threw himself into it with vision and energy and with the enthusiasm of the born promoter. He convinced the bankers who raised the funds; he headed the new company; he won public opinion to the cause by most skilful handling of the press and the adoption of a new attitude toward the patrons of his line which he expressed in what is still the slogan of the company: "The public be pleased," in contrast to W. H. Vanderbilt's "The public be damned."

That the railroad hovered on the brink of failure for years was not the promoter's fault; other railroad financiers have paid for being too far-sighted. It had, however, the effect of keeping Mr. McAdoo from becoming a very rich man, for he owned, by public repute, large blocks of the common stock, which has never paid dividends. This disappointment was but another spur to his ambition. The Wilson campaign gave him his great opportunity. He was an amateur in politics and so was William F. McCombs; but together they managed the campaign extremely well—not altogether unselfishly, because both were determined to enter the Cabinet if they won. Of course, Mr. Wilson would not have been elected had there been no Republican split, but that does not reflect upon the skill with which his canvass was conducted nor upon the ability of his managers. Mr. McAdoo was unquestionably sincerely sympathetic with the so-called radicalism of Wilson. He grew to espouse liberal causes as the campaign progressed, and when the Wilson Administration took office he fell in most cordially with Mr. Wilson's ban upon Wall Street. Speedily he became one of the worst-hated men in that section; he broke off the connections of the Riggs National Bank with the Treasury Department; he turned out of his offices the representative of the National City Bank of New York, and he appointed as Comptroller of the Currency John Skelton Williams, who proceeded to antagonize the powers that be to the limit of his very considerable ability.

That Mr. McAdoo was an able Secretary of the Treasury will hardly be denied. The longer he stayed there the worse the money power hated him. His administration of the railroads was the finishing touch. As to this there are two directly diverse opinions. Wall Street insists that the devil himself could not have more mismanaged the railroads; Mr. McAdoo's friends feel that he did extraordinarily well with roads that were collapsing through inefficiency when they were turned over to him; many believe that he proved the case for government ownership. There is no doubt whatever that one of the great incentives Mr. McAdoo now has to win the Presidency for himself is his desire to be in a position to have a settlement with Wall Street on his own terms. On the other hand, no Democratic nomination will so unloosen the purse-strings of the backers of the Republican Party as would Mr. McAdoo's. They know him to be able; they know that he knows their game, and that he has in a sense turned state's evidence.

Why, then, do not liberals everywhere acclaim Mr. McAdoo's candidacy? Because they lack faith in his character. Some, like ourselves, believe him to be ruthless in achieving his ends. From his Department came the vilest preachments of bitterness and hate during the war. Even in 1914 he was, by his own words, willing to sacrifice 50,000 American lives, if need be, to avenge the so-called insult to the flag at Vera Cruz. He saw no wrong in our fleet's going there and killing some four hundred men, women, and boys for the trifling act of a trifling Mexican colonel. He is an imperialist abroad and at home; his race prejudices are deep and insurmountable. As President he might easily plunge us into a war with Japan if he felt that it would profit his party or his administration. We would not deny the qualities attributed to him on another page by Mr. Barnes. He has many of the qualities which Mr. Wilson lacked, and he is superior to Mr. Wilson as an executive. But the spirit of the man is wrong. It does not belong in the White House even if his personal record were clean.

We must state our opinion that Mr. McAdoo's nomination would be a moral disaster for the whole country. It would mean that a great party had overlooked offenses against good taste and decency which ought never to be overlooked. He sold his influence as the son-in-law of the President to Doheny and to others, and he marketed his reputation as one who had just emerged from the Treasury. What more natural than that the French and Italian merchants who came to this country to buy 800,000 tons of coal should yield to the influence and prestige of the man who had just quitted the Cabinet, and through him give to that ex-criminal Charles W. Morse and his United States Transport Company the order to deliver their coal? They did not know, of course, that Mr. McAdoo was to receive one dollar for each ton he sold and that he was also bound by his obligations to Mr. Morse to use his great influence with the Shipping Board to obtain the ships needed for the coal when ships were scarce. It was his right to be Doheny's lawyer if he chose so to act, but no reputable lawyer, we feel, would accept a million-dollar contingent retainer to induce the Government of Mexico to reverse its constitutional policy in regard to oil lands, especially if he were the son-in-law of the then President of the United States and just out of the Cabinet. The fee was not to be for legal services; no legal services could be worth such a fee.

We join with the New York World in saying that this man's candidacy will not do. That it is so strong is but another proof of that decay of moral sensibility in America which tolerates the candidacy of Calvin Coolidge, who never lifted a finger to drive the rascals out. Surely the next proper step if such as these prevail would be to auction off the Presidency from the steps of the Capitol at Washington to the highest bidder.

What Do You Read?

TWENTY-FIVE years ago Delos F. Wilcox examined issues of 110 daily newspapers printed in fourteen cities and tabulated the space which they devoted to various subjects. In the Editor and Publisher of May 31 Paul W. White sets forth the results of a similar survey in the present year, for which purpose he studied an equal number of newspapers but chose them from sixty-three cities. The increase of our journals in sheer bulk is the most striking change in the quarter of a century—the typical newspaper of today has sixteen pages of eight columns each as against a journal of twelve pages of seven columns each in 1899. When it comes to the distribution of this space Mr. Wilcox found the following percentages in 1899:

I. News	55.3
(a) War News	17.9
(b) General	21.8
Foreign	1.2
Politics	6.4
Crime	3.1
Miscellaneous	11.1
(c) Special	15.6
Business	8.2
Sport	5.1
Society	2.3
II. Illustrations	3.1
III. Literature	2.4
IV. Opinion	7.1
(a) Editorials	3.9
(b) Letters	3.2
V. Advertisements	32.1

Mr. White, in his survey for the current year, found newspaper space thus distributed:

I. News	40.5
(a) General	22.1
Foreign	2.3
Politics	6.5
Crime	4.9
Miscellaneous	8.4
(b) Special	18.4
Business	7.9
Sport	7.5
Theater	1.5
Society	0.8
Radio	0.9
II. Illustrations	5.7
III. Literature	5.3
IV. Opinion	2.7
(a) Editorials	2.2
(b) Letters	0.5
V. Advertisements	45.8
(a) Classified	14.3
(b) Display	31.5

The "war news" of 1899 probably refers to the negotiations at the close of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine troubles, and the early dispatches in regard to the Boer War. One sees at first glance that in spite of the increased bulk of the modern newspaper the proportion of it that is devoted to news has decreased by more than 25 per cent. The percentage devoted to foreign affairs, however, as one would expect owing to the kaleidoscopic changes in Europe since the war and our greater relation to them, has almost doubled. Politics remains about the same, while crime shows a notable increase. The percentage of space devoted to sport also shows large expansion, while in society news there is a tremendous slump.

More striking than any changes in news policy, however, is the decreased space given to opinion. The percentage devoted to editorial utterance has been reduced by more than two-thirds, while letters to the editors have been cut to about one-sixth of their former quota. The decline in the editorial influence and importance of American newspapers has long been a familiar fact. So far as space goes, Mr. White finds that the decline is not only proportional but actual, the newspapers examined printing an average of fifty-six inches of editorial a day in 1924 as against sixty-five inches in 1899. This curtailment of letters to the editor Mr. White regards as "evidence of the lost intimacy between reader and editor." It is also due to the tendency toward standardization of thought, with an increasing contempt on the part of the wealthy owners of the modern press for the views of readers, and an unwillingness to give dissenting opinion a chance to express itself.

Finally, and perhaps most important of all, one notes that the proportion of space devoted to advertising has increased by about 50 per cent. In actual amount the advance is still more impressive, the daily average of advertising having jumped in twenty-five years from 539 inches to 1,172 inches. It is only another proof, of course, of the increased commercialization of our press. As Mr. White puts it:

It is evident that the business department of a newspaper has become more and more important. When one considers that in the last twenty-five years the circulation of daily newspapers throughout the United States has jumped approximately 15,000,000, and that the financial demands of present-day journalism have grown consistently more complex, there is seen to be ample cause for this development.

Aliens?

ARE native Americans determined to go back to work—go back, that is, to the hard and menial and dangerous jobs that for half a century European immigrants have been doing for them? No doubt it would do the native Americans good; but are they ready to accept it, and is that what, consciously, they are driving at? One asks these questions as he notes the gathering opinion in favor of a rigid exclusion policy toward immigration. One wonders whether the native Americans who so complacently look forward to drying up our stream of immigration, especially the peasantry of Southern Europe, have considered what is to become then of the top-heavy civilization which we have reared upon the alien's back.

Would that all self-satisfied Americans, "native white of native parentage," might read the moving epitaph written in the Corriere d'America of the men who were killed in New York City recently in the collapse of the scaffolding for a new building. As Luigi Barzini writes the story:

A body is recovered: that of Boccarossi. Then another dead is dragged away: Purcelli; a third whose name was Brigliano, and a fourth—Colarossi. Then there were the wounded: Disomilli, Marzoni, Costello, Dimmello, Socci, Maselli—all Italian names. But why? Nobody asked for what reason there were no English, Scandinavian, or German workers among those crushed under death's heel.

We wish that all those who applaud today the presidential sanction given to the law which amounts to almost an exclusion of the Italian immigrants, and all the writers of complacent editorials on the subject, would meditate on this simple list of Italian names, some of which are going to be engraved on humble tombstones.

There was nothing unusual about this accident. It received only passing notice in the daily press, and has already been forgotten by the average reader. It was one of a long series of accidents—avoidable or otherwise—that represent the human cost of modern construction. Every mile of subway in New York City, every tunnel under the East or the North River was blasted and burrowed and thrust forward with the blood of human sacrifice. The vast excavation which made possible the terminal of the Pennsylvania Railroad in the heart of the metropolis is the tomb of scores of humble laborers from the blue coast of the Mediterranean.

It was not mere chance [says the Corriere d'America] that put in those murderous foundations those Italian workmen. They are to be found wherever there is risk and danger. Some of their blood is at the bottom of all this rising greatness. They are there because today no other civilized race has men to offer for pioneer's work. The Nordic "white-collar men" for whose benefit a discriminatory law has been enacted, those men so dear to Johnson, to Davis, and to Reed because they do not look like laborers, will lay siege to offices, not to works, to mines, or fields. It is the collarless and bare-armed man who goes into the hardest fight in creation. And it is Italy alone that can today give athletes to the world of labor, as she gives artists and mechanics. Forty per cent of the statues which are erected all over the world are sculptured by Italians. No other country abounds as Italy does with the power which lays foundations and the genius that adorns, the energy that builds, and the talent that invents.

We are deeply moved in bowing to these victims who give their lives to this country. And we think that on their tombstones the words "American Citizens" could be engraved even if they could not speak English. They have paid for their right to citizenship.

That is a sentiment to which every American "native white of native parentage" ought humbly and reverently to say, Amen!

The Critical Scene

THE rise of American criticism in recent years has been astonishing. Was it not but the other day that it was held to be undignified to discuss any artist except the long dead or hopelessly remote? Was it not but yesterday that our criticism was hopelessly alienated from experience and dealt wholly with the supposed proprieties of decorum and rhetoric? We have changed. There is scarcely a season now that does not see the publication of one or more volumes of American criticism distinguished by vitality of thought and manner, by both insight and vigor. If these volumes are likely to be by the same hands, it means only that no period in the literature of a country can be expected to produce excellence of unlimited quantity in a given kind.

When from these more or less acknowledged chiefs of the critic's craft we descend to a somewhat lower level, the impression received is not quite so agreeable. Current criticism and reviewing are, upon the whole, more liberal in temper and perhaps more graceful in form than they were some years ago. More people are reading reviews, and more are writing reviews, but we doubt whether the reviews are essentially better thought out or more instructed; whether a talent of very high order would find itself really more patiently and intelligently understood.

The reasons for this state of affairs are not strictly literary. They are very human, often appallingly so. The influential reviewer today is usually on the staff of a newspaper or periodical. He has a job and he wants to keep it. In order to keep it he must entertain his public; he must entertain it every day or every week. He must not flag. Against the possibility of his flagging he must build ramparts of good-will, friendship, the praise of others. His public is more intelligent and responsive than it used to be, but it expects him to be smart and to be "in the swim"; it wants to know what it is good form to know; it wants a little boldness, but not too much; a little erudition but not enough to frighten; it wants civilized entertainment—but entertainment.

No wonder that, under the circumstances, the reviewer feels his position to be a precarious one. And since, through the amalgamation of newspapers and the rise in salaries, jobs are getting both fewer and more precious every day, it follows almost inevitably that the reviewing in our leading papers and periodicals is less than ever concerned with the object of the reviewer's craft. A book, in order to be praised, must preferably be one by an author who has shown himself pleasantly disposed to the reviewer; it is well, in addition, if it bears the imprint of a publisher who is "due" for reviews and is also hail-fellow-well-met with the reviewer; it must, of course, be a meritorious performance. Trash is almost never touted. But a book's merits must be such as the reviewer can imagine himself as achieving if he were to take the trouble or if his natural bent had been in that direction. A really beautiful, profound, or austere work is often slighted, misunderstood, or, what is most convenient, forgotten.

The most unhappy influence upon our critical scene, however, is not exercised by any critic or group of critics. It is exercised by the fashionable columnists of the great metropolitan dailies. These writers are not critics at all. They are, in the broader sense of the word, wits. They are often gifted and often have amazingly good sense. They must write daily. And what can they write of but people, plays, and books? Their columns are very popular; their personalities very conspicuous. They can make the fortune of a book by saying they have liked it, and damn one by saying, politely enough, that they can find nothing in it. Here, in brief, the fortunes of literature are at the mercy of a species of advertising that can be bought only at the price of intellectual mediocrity or smartness coupled, if possible, with presence at parties and a character that does not abash the kindly and clever gentlemen who conduct the columns. For they are both clever and kindly; and why should they not praise the novels of their woman friends, especially if these novels have some merit? They will swear quite sincerely that they would not mention the books if they were not good. True. Only in this process excellence is forgotten. It is not understood; also, it seems churlish. Santayana has never swapped quips on Forty-fourth Street. It cannot be told of him that he was squiffy last week at So-and-so's party. He and his like must wait. Gregariousness breeds warmth and pleasantness. And the public is pleased. Against such influences our serious critics avail but little. They are still voices crying—across a baseball field.

The Nordic Jubilee

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

Cleveland, June 8

YOU will find the story in the old chronicles of Speyer-on-the-Rhine.

Nowadays it is a dusty neighborhood of coal and iron and French soldiers in sloppy pantaloons. But six centuries ago it was the convention city par excellence of the old Holy Roman Empire, which was just about as holy and as Roman as the present National Republican Convention is national and republican. But we will let that go. I shall have enough to say about conventions later on. What interests me just now is the case of one Abraham ibn-Hillel Averroës Maroof, who late in the fifteenth century was rabbi of Speyer. How and why and in what manner he fell under the spell of the only true faith, no one seems to know. But one fine day he shocked his flock by the abrupt announcement that he intended to offer himself for Christian baptism and would undergo the blessed ordeal as soon as he had paid a visit to Rome and had there studied the organization which he expected to join.

Now, this, as I have just said, happened during the latter half of the fifteenth century when the reputation of the Papacy (with all due respect to the Al Smith sentiment among Nation readers) was not exactly as good as it might have been. Instead of one Pope, there were three or four. Instead of merely ruling the Realm of the Spirit, the Holy See had become an active participant in very worldly brawls. And as for the morals of the officials connected with the Lateran Palace, the least said the better. All this the good burghers of Speyer's Ghetto knew. Wherefore the decision of their shepherd failed to fill them with that dismay which overtakes a congregation when the minister is convicted of backsliding or bootlegging.

"Let the old man go," they said. "The trip will do him good. Perhaps he has been here too long and needs a change. Him get baptized? Never! after he has seen the sort of things he will see in Rome." And so they presented him with a true and faithful donkey to carry him across the mountains, and waited.

They waited eight months.

Then one day a gray-bearded pilgrim returned to Speyer wearing the garb of a Dominican monk. It was Abraham ibn-Hillel Averroës Maroof, Rabbi a. D. of the good town of Speyer.

Of course the relations between the former minister and his former flock became very strained. No one would speak to the poor old man, who seemed to have betrayed the cause which he had once sworn to uphold and who was now doomed to eternal loneliness. But one fine day the learned doctor Ludovicus Bruno, the author of the aforementioned chronicle, could stand it no longer. Driven by curiosity he called upon Dom Abrahamo and found him copying the Song of Songs into the Latin vernacular.

"Most Holy Brother," he asked, "explain one thing to me. Thou wentest to Rome. Thou sawest that glorious city fallen into an abyss of wickedness. Thou witnessedest the degradation of what was once pure and good. Yet thou returnest a member of that church which now is a stench in the nostrils of the most faithful of her children."

Dom Abraham looked up from his manuscript.

"Well hast thou spoken, oh excellent Ludovice," he answered. "Ere I had crossed the terrible ravines of the mighty Gotthard my heart almost had repented of the step I was about to take. Then I reached Rome. For six months I dwelled in the heart of the Eternal City. What I saw was an endless repetition of bribery and foulness and untruth, a mire of corruption and debased contamination. Never had I imagined such things could be. . . ."

"And yet," the good doctor interrupted him, "thou joinedest the church of which thou speakest these terrible things. . . .?"

"Of course I did. For I felt convinced that any organization which could be so unspeakably evil and still persist and rule the world must verily have the strength of a rock of granite."

I don't know how I happened to think of this yarn after three solid days in Cleveland. But I hasten to add that my faith in the Union is greater than ever before.

By nature I am not a joiner. Twelve years ago I went to Rome upon the same errand as Rabbi Maroof. But I found the City on the Seven Hills no better and no worse than other cities of that sort and so I continued to patronize the Baptist Church around the corner. Now, however, I have seen the representatives of a sovereign people assembled in solemn conclave to decide upon a new ruler. Surely a democracy exposed once in every four years to this sort of an affliction and still going strong with armies and navies and bank accounts—such a democracy has my whole-hearted support. This time I am here as a reporter. Four years from now I hope to be present with a large brass disk in my buttonhole. It will bear the proud title of "Delegate."

Let us be merciful and mention the one thing that can be said in favor of this noble gathering. It is composed of Nordics. The foreigner and the Negro and the Jew are almost totally missing and cannot be held responsible for whatever happens. Years from now when their children look them in the face and ask: "Daddy, what did you do in 1924?" they at least can answer: "Never mind, you nasty little brat. I was not at the Republican convention."

The thing is sad.

It is really so sad that the participants themselves feel slightly ashamed of what they are doing. This convention is suffering from a mysterious case of conscience.

Once, years ago when I lived in the Village, I knew an honest crook. One day I found him in tears. I asked what had happened. "It is terrible," he howled. "It will break my heart. Here I went out to rob a bank. I had made ready for that job more than six weeks. I had bought a whole bagful of new hammers and chisels and a fine new patented acetylene torch. I had ordered some of that lovely soup which they invented in Germany last year. I was all set and it was going to be the greatest thing in my young life. Well, I went to the bank. It was do or die with me. I was ready for everything and then" (and here the tears poured down his honest cheeks) "I found that they had forgotten to lock the safe. All I had to do was to walk in and grab the stuff and walk out again. It was easy. It was dead easy. It was too easy. And it has broken my heart. For if a thing is as easy as all that it is sure that there is something wrong with it."

Maybe it is the rain which has been pouring down upon the Coolidge home clubs these last sixty hours. Maybe it is the fog which never lifts from the lake. Maybe it is the recollection of a peaceful little house next to the Westport cemetery. But I seem to have a terrible tendency toward oracular pronouncements this morning.

The trouble is that one can't swear in The Nation. And the situation in Cleveland can only be expressed in monosyllabic chunks of profanity.

Try and imagine the setting of the stage for this gigantic piece of hokum.

On the one hand we have a candidate who has as much personality as last year's time-table.

On the other hand we have the most powerful and the richest and the most glorious and the grandest country in the world. And a small piece of this nation in freedom conceived is going to name a man for whom not one-third of one per cent of the sum total of the delegates feel one-third of one per cent of personal liking or admiration or even respect. And five months from now their henchmen just as deliberately are going to try to vote this same candidate back into the White House for four years more of mush and maple-sugar.

The delegates themselves know it. The delegates-at-large know it. The alternates know it. The three hundred hard-boiled newspaper brethren here present know it. We all know it.

For this is not a conspiracy of silence. On the contrary, it is a conspiracy of publicity.

Brother Lodge last night was relegated to the backwoods of the Back Bay. The Old Guard is dead and gone. But the new guard which has stepped into the place of these esteemed fossils carries on the ancient and dishonorable tradition with undiminished loyalty and persistence.

Nothing has changed.

Everything has remained as it has always been before. But with one slight difference. I refer the reader back to my fable about the heart-broken crook.

There is a feeling of uneasiness in the air. The victory has been almost too easy. In the olden days the managers of this curious performance showed at least an outward respect to the decencies of the occasion. There were receptions and badges and cigars and bands and impromptu speeches and prepared statements. There were all the other paraphernalia of the Kingdom of Make-Belief.

This time they have dispensed with these unnecessary trifles. The boobs would obey them if they were asked to swim out into Lake Erie and deposit their vote three miles from shore. So, why waste money? The newspaper readers would devour the printed pronouncements of office boys. Why hire an expert in grammar and syntax to explain the lofty ideals of the G. O. P.?

It sounded like good common sense. But there is such a thing as overdoing a slick act. The rulers of our broad acres, come together to keep the world safe for the assembled chambers of commerce, have made one bad slip.

The battle of the Marne was lost by the Germans because they were overconfident and despised their enemies. I suggest that some one present Messieurs Butler and Burton with a marked copy of Von Kluck's Memoirs.

BULLETIN OF GRAVE IMPORTANCE

Cleveland, June 10

After Hon. Theodore Burton had read the first 197 pages of his keynote speech and I had made forty-eight pictures of his wardrobe, I sent one sketch to William Allen White.

"Tell me, dear Mr. White," I asked, "who is Burton's tailor?"

I had my answer by return mail, via Ring Lardner.

"The American Tent and Awning Company," our Kansas comrade reported.

THE Keyholder

Coo with Coolidge

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE spirit of the management of the Republican convention at Cleveland was that all good doves in the dove-cote will coo with Coolidge and with Coolidge's Mr. Butler.

Old pouter pigeons like Lodge of Massachusetts and Watson of Indiana and Wadsworth of New York, having been deprived of their customary or expected perches in the convention councils of the party, were supposed to coo just the same and, if they would not coo, were free to go off and pout by themselves.

In fact, the truly professional politicians in the convention pouted a great deal in numerous cases. They said:

"Observe; we at any rate deal in votes. We hold office because of votes. We are elected persons. But observe the managers of this convention.

"At the top there is Butler, Mr. Coolidge's personal manager. He apparently, besides being Mr. Coolidge's personal manager, is further instructed or permitted by Mr. Coolidge to manage everything else. He announces the names of chairmen of committees before the committees have even been formed. He gives out interviews on the policies which the convention will follow. Very well. Who is he and who are the men to whom he is giving prominence and power?

"He himself is a textile manufacturer and not in any office at all.

"Frank W. Mondell, the permanent chairman, ceased to be an elected person last year and is now a presidential appointee in the War Finance Corporation in Washington.

"Marion LeRoy Burton, who will place Mr. Coolidge in nomination, is a university president.

"Charles B. Warren, the chairman of the resolutions committee, used to be national committeeman from Michigan, but was let out of the job four years ago and has since been spending his time in foreign countries.

"People have called us the Old Guard. The Old Guard consisted of the most influential of the elected persons whom the people themselves have put into office. Or it consisted additionally of persons who consulted those elected persons and who operated through them.

"Now look at the new guard. Look at progress. The bosses are persons whom the people have not elected to office, but who become bosses and who control a Republican National Convention through personal appointment by the President or by the President's Massachusetts mill-owner."

Thus pouted the Old Guard during the first two and a half days of the convention. The mass of the convention, however, continued happily and loyally to coo.

The mass of the convention perceived that Mr. Butler was making the Republican Party less and less in the image of a political party and more and more in the image of a patriotic, efficient, businesslike rotary club. The mass of the convention approved and it cooed accordingly.

A new Republican Party was being created. Gone were the emotionality of Lincoln, the dare-deviltry of Blaine, the humanity of Hanna, the impetuosity of Roosevelt; instead there were a rising calculation, preciseness, scientific management, and autocratic orders from the planning-room.

A mill-owner says: "Lay off three hundred hands."

A boss talks to eight thousand persons and finds out which three hundred of them are the least popular with the rest and then says: "Lay off those three hundred."

For two and a half days Mr. Butler ran a mill at Cleveland.

Some people knew that with such methods he was bound at least to stub his toe. Among them was an old Negro barber in one of the hotels.

He had been a friend of Mark Hanna's. He never, however, called him Mark Hanna or Mr. Hanna. He always called him "the old man." Toward the end of the second day of the convention he suddenly leaned back from shaving a customer and ejaculated:

"I know what is happening. The Old Man is watching this Mr. Butler of Massachusetts trying to run a convention and he's giggling in his grave."

He giggled more the next night. Mr. Butler, in between ballot one and ballot two on the Vice-Presidency, said: "Now we'll put Burton over," meaning Burton of Ohio.

With the Illinois delegation sat Mark Hanna's daughter, Mrs. Medill McCormick. The Illinois delegation was observed conferring. Then it was observed conferring across the aisle with the New York delegation. The regulars were getting tired of being bossed by the amateurs. The balloting began; and the regulars snowed Burton under by such a margin that they unwittingly nominated Lowden.

Lowden having withdrawn, Mr. Burton then, without any adequate consultation with the leaders of delegations, sent the word out casually for Hoover. The regulars went to Dawes. Dawes had been definitely rejected at a conference strongly attended by regulars the night before. He had been rejected because of his record on one subject of labor. Nevertheless, now, with Mr. Butler going to Hoover, the regulars went to Dawes and Dawes was nominated.

The Old Guard felt better. It had pouted. It had pecked. It had seen Mr. Butler flounder on the subject of Kenyon for Vice-President and flounder on the subject of Borah for Vice-President, and it had thereupon taken the convention away from him and given him a Lowden for his Burton and a Dawes for his Hoover. The Old Guard preened itself and prepared to remount its perches.

The next morning at the meeting of the National Committee Mr. Butler, as the new chairman, announced that the chairman must naturally name all the committee's officers—which he thereupon proceeded to do. He also named a subcommittee, which in turn named an executive committee, to which the National Committee thereupon confided and transferred all its powers.

A national committeeman from a Western State rose in the meeting of the National Committee and demanded that the executive committee during the campaign be at least obliged to tell the National Committee what it is doing.

He was very red and very excited. He illustrated the Republican Party's greatest present technical political difficulty. It is very hard for these regulars to keep cooing and yet also keep cool.

The Convention of the Fit-to-Rule

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Cleveland, June 13

I REACHED Cleveland's magnificent convention hall just as the amplifiers were braying to the crowd around the doors the solemn invocation of Bishop William F. Anderson with which the proceedings were opened. This was what I heard: "Lord make straight in the desert a highway for our God . . . and the crooked shall be made straight." "For once," said I, "a divine has prayed directly to the point." Right under him sat Harry Daugherty. Right under him were grouped all the leaders to whom a return to normalcy had meant nothing else than the right of the Republican Party to plunder the people of what was theirs for the benefit of the favored few. They had made a highway for their God through the desert left by the Democratic Administration and that God was, as before, the God of business success, the God of special privilege, the God of the exploitation of the masses on behalf of the big-business masters of the Republican Party.

But as the convention progressed I speedily saw in common with every other journalist that that prayer was not as useful a one as the bishop could have uttered. What he should have voiced was an appeal to the Almighty to protect the beloved party from the novices who have undertaken to run it and from its President, who is supposed to be the guiding spirit behind the new machinists, Messrs. William M. Butler and Frank W. Stearns, both of Massachusetts. If the efforts to make the crooked straight do not bulk as large in the press tomorrow as they might be expected to in view of the vigorous efforts of the speakers who followed the bishop to make black white, why, lay it down to the fact that the convention instead of being sublime was ridiculous, instead of being dignified was a joke. The oldest correspondents rubbed their eyes and agreed that the party which through the voices of Elihu Root and Henry Cabot Lodge used to assure the world that it alone in America was fit to rule ran its convention as if it were a high-school affair.

It started off running so smoothly that you almost began to feel that the managers were going to get away with a most difficult and dangerous situation. Theodore Burton made the only kind of speech he could have made. By way of encouraging them to work for Coolidge he lambasted the congressional leaders of his party as they sat before him and blamed Congress for all that has happened so far as the legislative program is concerned. The platform was as platforms go a pretty fair specimen. It concealed the party's crimes and glossed over its failures with great skill. Then ex-Congressman Mondell of Wyoming, whose selection as permanent chairman was one of the egregious mistakes of the tyros in politics, made the real swashbuckling speech of the meeting. His is the philosophy of the thief caught with the goods on him—bluff it through. So he solemnly assured the convention that the Republican Party had never made a mistake in its life and never undertaken a policy which was not wise, noble, and true, and that the Democrats were nothing but a set of cut-throat scoundrels. Abuse some one else and you may make the hearer forget that you yourself have just committed murder and rape.

But, after all, the procedure was a bit too smooth, a bit too hypocritical. The real nature of the beast here assembled now and then flashed out none the less. This convention cheered everything which made for property rights, which fortified privilege. It reached its greatest height of spontaneous enthusiasm when Ambassador Warren announced that, as heretofore, the Republican Party was unalterably opposed to the government's going into private business. The rank and file understands exactly what this phrase means—that the party will interfere with nobody's private preserves, but that it will go on, as heretofore, using all the power of the government to make money for those who line its coffers and back it at the polls. It will not go into private business except to guarantee through protective tariffs and in other ways the size of the profits that the insiders shall make. All of its specious promises that the conservation policies of Theodore Roosevelt shall be maintained and the oil and timber and unoccupied coal lands shall be reserved for the people the delegates swallowed with their tongues in their cheeks—all that the Sinclairs and Dohenys and the timber and coal barons have not yet got!

Yet a consciousness of shame was there, a guilty consciousness. Why else was there not a single handclap in this Republican gathering when the keynoter, Congressman Burton, first mentioned in this Ohio city the name of that great and wise and pure and sterling son of Ohio, Warren G. Harding? He, Mr. Burton assured us, died as much for his country as if he had been a soldier full panoplied in armor at the battlefield. Why was it that every time a speaker promised that the Washington guilty will be punished there was but the faintest applause from this assembly of this party of moral ideals and moral progress? Why was it that every time a speaker denounced those who would besmirch the innocent, who would pour the slime of slander over all the officials of the government, or would seek to destroy confidence in our perfect government, the delegates woke up and cheered and applauded with genuine enthusiasm? It is the apotheosis of the lax business morals of the day, this convention. It is impossible to have seen it and not feel that the bulk of its members have no burning sense of shame that its official representatives have dragged the good name of the republic in the dust, and throughout the world made the American name a synonym for corruption in the highest places.

So it is hypocrisy who was king here. Congressman Burton's speech reeked with it. He was lost in admiration of Mr. Coolidge's rectitude in the face of temptation—we have sunk to that point that we have to praise the President of the United States for not being a crook! The angels, he said, fell, but this superangel in the White House did not. And when it came to the World Court, Mr. Burton unblushingly assured his blind supporters that they need not fear that our adhesion to the court would put us into the League—Mr. Hughes and Mr. Coolidge were there to see that we did not get in—Mr. Hughes, who was one of the thirty Republicans who signed an appeal to their fellow-countrymen to vote for Mr. Harding as the surest way to get the country into the League! Indeed, it seemed as if the World Court were destined to be the touchstone of the hypocrisy of the whole show, for it is a fact that a majority of the committee to which it was referred was opposed to the convention's indorsing the court! When Senator "Jim" Watson ruled that it would none the less have to report a resolution favoring the court to oblige the President, he was begged for permission to submit a dissenting minority report. No, that would destroy the harmony of things. So the committee reported a resolution to which a majority of its members were opposed! Could subservient puppetry go further? As for law and order, the delegates did applaud with real fervor the demand for the anti-lynching bill, which was killed more than once by the dishonesty of some of the party's own congressional representatives, but it did not dare to mention the enforcement of the prohibition laws by name nor did its denunciation of the Ku Klux Klan go beyond such glittering generalities that the here assembled klans and kleagles may return to their home towns with absolute satisfaction. Who would not applaud the demand for the enforcement of all the laws—even if he had a bottle of rum on his hip?

Mr. Warren and his Cutaway

So it was that the Wisconsin representatives blew the breath of life into the proceedings, redeemed the convention from the subserviency of a herd of soulless delegates, and quickened our faith in the survival in America of truth and honesty, reason and courage. That was a glorious spectacle, that brave delegation sitting there calm and cool in the face of abuse and denunciation, while their fellow-delegates were crowding menacingly around them, shaking fists and State emblems in their faces, and demanding that they be thrown out. That was a test of moral courage nobly met and nobly answered, and it had its effect upon those who tried to mob them for daring to maintain that they had the right to think for themselves and to vote as they thought. Talk about the effects of non-resistance! Gradually the attacks wore themselves out; gradually it dawned upon the assailants that these men were sustained by something which, if the majority could not understand it, the majority finally had to respect. And that showed itself when the Wisconsin spokesman, Congressman Henry Cooper, took the platform in the one thrilling moment of the convention to offer the minority report from the resolutions committee. He had years and white hairs in his favor—even an audience like this one has respect for age. But the attitude of the audience had changed. The fierce demands to throw them out were no longer there. Moral courage had aroused among the majority of the delegates a sense of fair play.

Four years ago the Wisconsin men were handicapped somewhat by the personality of their spokesman. This time they had chosen well. This veteran Congressman and lifelong Republican knew just how to handle that audience. He was bothered not at all by the hostile part of his reception. He had skill in speaking, good taste, and good humor, and he won that audience to an extraordinary degree.

"Young Bob," Director of His Father's Campaign

Moreover, he was eternally right. Even the most hard-boiled delegates could not answer back when he declared that of the thirty-one planks which the Wisconsin men have advanced in Republican conventions since 1908 no less than twenty-six are now the law of the land. In the face of that truth no one could doubt the correctness of the Congressman's statement that what is wrong with Republican Wisconsin is that it is always in advance of its party. Of course, many of the planks he brought forward were hissed and booed, especially the one calling for government ownership of railroads—yet it is safe to say that if another party does not get ahead of them, it will be only a few years before the Republican Party will be discussing this issue as a matter of course and quite forgetting to call the advocates of the policy radical and un-American. Did not this convention finally grant, with a great show of virtue, equal representation to women in the party's councils, forgetting the decades that its Henry Cabot Lodges and its McKinleys would not hear a word of woman suffrage?

No, if the Republicans were wise they would commission an artist to paint that brave, stalwart Congressman from Wisconsin facing that hostile audience in this amazingly beautiful convention hall and they would place that picture among their most precious archives as the only scene of the Convention of 1924 worth preserving—one brave conscience put in pawn to win a party and to serve a country!

And then we went down fast to bathos and buncombe. True, President Burton's nominating speech was adroit and lively, neither an unrestrained eulogy nor a preachment—he was the entertainer and not the orator. But even his light touch could not really arouse the audience to great enthusiasm. Indubitably there were many there who believe that Cal is a great man, but the applause would have died away in less than three minutes if it had not been artificially stimulated. The organ did good work, and when the crowd began to sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and "John Brown's Body," you could not but feel moved and stirred and realize anew the superiority of song to the spoken word, particularly when spoken by politicians.

Presto. It was a circus that then performed before us. Nominating Cal exhausted the convention morally and physically and spiritually. It showed no mercy to the seconders and hooted or unduly applauded a Southern Baptist, a New Jersey Negro, and a New York Jew. Only the ladies escaped. One of them, Minnie Grinstead from Kansas, stirred the convention as did none of the endless tributes to Cal's homely virtues. The minute she faced the audience she let out a scream that all but smashed the amplifier in front of her. It was like the combined roar of a world facing extinction on Judgment Day, and its startling suddenness automatically lifted 12,500 bored and inattentive people out of their seats. They rose to their feet as if unleashed lions were after them and then broke into waves and waves and more waves of joyous laughter. And when Minnie from Kansas concluded her praise of Cal in about 123 seconds of oratory, the audience stood again and cheered her to the echo as long as they could see her scarlet dress descending among the delegates.

Henry Allen Cooper

Aside from her flaming attire Minnie Grinstead, of Liberty, Kansas, will long remain the bright, outstanding figure of that convention in the minds of that multitude of her grateful fellow-citizens—grateful for anybody or anything that added the touch of the unexpected to so cut-and-dried and formulated a gathering.

When it came to the Vice-Presidency the new machine broke down and the utter ineptitude of Messrs. Butler and Stearns was revealed. They hawked the office around from one to another. Borah, Kenyon, Burton, Hoover were successively put forward. Mr. Butler solemnly assured the mid-night conference of Wednesday in John Weeks's room that Senator Borah would accept the nomination. It was three o'clock before Senator Borah was able to reach friends on the long-distance telephone and assure them that he was still sound of mind and in possession of all his senses, and that he had no intention whatever of committing moral and political suicide. Also, he added, if report is correct, that if the Butlers persisted in nominating him he would decline in a letter in which he would state his reasons for refusing to go on a ticket with Cal in language which would not be very helpful to the candidate. Only high-school boys running a mock convention might have been expected to make that ridiculous blunder of nominating Lowden despite his word. The inwardness of that happening is, however, that Messrs. Butler and Stearns having decided to nominate seventy-three-year-old Theodore Burton and having expressed their wishes to that effect, the Old Guard promptly, in the language of the street, "handed them one" by nominating Lowden. A last-hour attempt of the amateur convention-steerers to put over Hoover was met by the stampede to Dawes as another rebuke to them. That was the greatest political blunder of all from the point of view of vote-getting, but by that time everybody was so sick and tired and disgusted that nobody cared; if General Dawes had declined the proffered post the next nominee might well have been the colorful Minnie from Kansas.

Thus ended, completely botched, the convention of the party of the fit-to-rule. Every generation thinks its own leaders are pigmies and sighs for the giants of yesterday; but allowing for that ocular obliquity all honest observers here are united in their belief that this was the most degraded and degrading and vulgar of conventions. Years of experience with these excrescences of our political life have familiarized me somewhat with their manners, habits, and customs, and I must unhesitatingly add my belief that we touched bottom in this gathering, for intellectual bankruptcy, for stupidity, for blind subservience to an accidental leader whom so many dislike or detest personally, but—if they are Republicans—praise loudly in public. All the old Republican leaders were as disgusted as the newspaper men and many of them went home intending to sulk for the remainder of the campaign. Of course, after a while they will bury the hatchet, but they cannot possibly put the enthusiasm into the fight which they normally would be able to. Such frank hypocrisy I have never before witnessed in my political experience. One Senator from a far Western State tells even casual acquaintances that Cal "will not carry a State west of the Mississippi," but when talking for publication says: "We shall keep our peerless leader in the White House." Ask any Senator as he sits at dinner or lunch what the chances for Cal are in his State if the third ticket is put in the field, and he says: "We might as well give up the ghost now. But if you are asking me for publication, why, I am going to talk the usual stuff of a landslide in our noble State for our great President."

After three days here one is inevitably forced to the conclusion that there is no longer any republic in America, or any democracy. We are ruled by a king and his name is Bunk.

A Pacifist General

By MOLLIE BEST

The key to the age may be this or that or the other, as the young orators describe; the key to all ages is imbecility, imbecility in the vast majority at all times, and even in heroes in all but certain eminent moments; victims of gravity, custom, and fear. This gives force to the strong, that the multitude have no habit of self-reliance or original action.—EMERSON.

NEARLY three centuries ago a determined band of believers resisted the authority of the established church, then a recognized branch of the English government. George Fox, general-in-chief of the Quaker revolt against the union of church and state, was preeminently a man of self-reliance and original action, and he lined up a little army against the forces of gravity, custom, and fear. So marked was his fearlessness that, while a prisoner in the vilest of dungeons, his soldier guard clamored to have him made their officer. As recruiting was dragging, army officials offered him liberty and the command; he chose imprisonment instead. "I told them I was come into a covenant of peace which was before wars and strifes were. That I lived in the virtue of that life and power which took away the occasion of all wars. I told them I knew whence all wars arose, even from the lusts according to James's doctrine." "Clense your hands, ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye double-minded," he advised. George Fox's centenary will be celebrated in England and America this July.

The unsympathetic historian, Macaulay, hurls various epithets at the Quaker leader. "He was a youth of pure morals, grave deportment, and a perverse temper, with the education of a laboring man, and an intellect in that most unhappy of all states, too disordered for liberty and not sufficiently disordered for Bedlam." Making no allowance for youth, Macaulay also ignores the fact that Cromwell's "glance of genius" approvingly scanned the Quaker, without detecting any mental malady. A leader who can offer to his followers only torture, imprisonment, and death, and yet rally thousands of shock troops, can hardly be swept into Bedlam by the paragraph of a temperamental historian. Judging by Macaulay's own story of the times, Fox's "unhappy state" was no distinction among his contemporaries; the aggressive and boisterous religionists of all denominations were more nearly allied with Bedlam than with Christianity. Seizing power, the Puritans regarded capital punishment as a mild sentence for traitors who dared to use the Book of Common Prayer. Driven out in turn by the grave and reverend Lords Spiritual, their Solemn League and Covenant was sentenced to be ceremoniously hanged by the public hangman. If the Quakers were fanatics for peace with freedom their opponents were equally fanatical for compulsion with violence, and only the courage of fanaticism could successfully cope with the violence of arrogant power.

Whatever Fox's mental and educational limitations, he succeeded in hurling thousands of the canniest of his hard-headed countrymen against the prevailing violence, inspiring them with a faith impervious to every form of fear—"most Enfeeblers of the Passions"—fear of public opinion, of personal disaster, or of man's last invincible enemy, death. "I showed them that God was come to teach His people by His spirit, to bring them off from all their old ways, religions, churches, and worships; for all their religions, worships, and ways were but talking with other men's words, but they were out of the life and spirit which they were in who gave them forth." His intrepid band of outlaws heckled the spiritually impotent clergy who reviled them, declaring that God did not dwell in their "steeple houses," but in the hearts of men who loved and served Him. A few such thunderclaps, and it was not necessary to be especially weatherwise to predict that signals would soon be hung out for storms and high gales.

In the days of the Great Rebellion men everywhere were forced to do a little thinking, much as they disliked mental exertion. The futile grumbling groups were welded into power by forceful leaders who offered them direction. Cromwell, leading the revolt against civil authority, believed in physical force to the uttermost, and wielded it to such purpose that all Europe shook with the impact. Fox, with unquestioning faith in the omnipotence of spiritual force and the inevitable triumph of right, led the revolt against the clerical autocracy. When the old lion Cromwell and the Quaker met, the two most forceful personalities in England faced each other, and there is room for the suspicion that, wearying of the tyranny of the populace, of which he was both master and slave, the dictator regarded the Quaker with a pathetic envy, as having chosen the better part. If the powerful Cardinal Mazarin feared Oliver with his Ironsides more than he feared the devil, Fox and his militantly pacifist army, firing with the flame of faith and personality the smoldering discontent against the clerical power, were no less terrifying to the English clergy. "The Lord said unto me, that if but one man or woman were raised up by His power to stand and live in the same spirit that the prophets and apostles were in who gave forth the Scriptures, that man or woman should shake all the country in their profession (Christianity) for ten miles round." Fox stood and lived, and the country shook far outside the ten-mile limit.

William Penn describes his leader as "of an innocent life, no busybody nor self-seeker. So meek, contented, modest, tender, it was a pleasure to be in his company. A most merciful man, as ready to forgive, as unapt to take or give offense. . . . The most excellent spirits loved him with an unfeigned and unfading love. . . . He was no more to be moved to fear than to wrath."

Fox's autobiography is the most racy of all the Quaker journals, flavored with his personality and a dry astringent humor. He makes his genealogy snappy but significant.

My father's name was Christopher Fox, and he was by profession a weaver, an honest man, and there was the seed of God in him. My mother was an upright woman and of the stock of the martyrs. . . . My relations thought to have made me a priest (clergyman) but others persuaded to the contrary; whereupon I was put to a man who was a shoemaker by trade, and dealt in wool . . . and a great deal went through my hands. I never wronged man or woman in all that time. . . . It was a common saying among those who knew me, "If George says Verily, there is no altering him."

"At the command of God" George abandoned business when twenty years old. A religious youth, oppressed by the orgy of violence and dishonesty, the result of futile fratricidal wars, he began his quest for a remedy for the spiritual disease.

As I traveled through the country professors (Christians) took notice of me, and sought to be acquainted with me, but I was afraid of them, for I was sensible they did not possess what they professed. . . . I went to many a priest for comfort, but found none from them. . . . Some tender people would have had me stay, but I was fearful and returned homeward, having regard upon my mind to my parents and relations, lest I should grieve them, for I understood they were troubled at my absence.

He scoured the country for miles, appealing to clergymen of great reputation. Some advised physic, others blood-letting, and "one jolly old clergyman of the Anglican communion" (Macaulay) suggested psalm singing and tobacco. "Tobacco was a thing I did not love, and psalms I was not in a state to sing. I could not sing."

For the boy's spiritual distress the church could offer only physical remedies, and his despair continued until he received the revelation, which moved Macaulay to derision, that an education at Oxford or Cambridge could not qualify men to be ministers of Christ. "When my hopes in them (the clergy) and all men were gone . . . I heard a voice which said: Christ Jesus can speak to thy condition . . . who enlightens and gives grace and faith and power. And this I knew experimentally."

Fox had come to the crossing of the roads, and it was the senility of the intrenched order that decided him on the first turn to the left in the path of revolt. The enthusiasm of his new freedom he communicated to other waiting souls with such success that his followers glutted the English jails—black holes of incredible vileness, in which many of our liberties were born. When not in jail Fox was beaten up by mobs, at times temporarily crippled, often at the instigation of the clergy whose monopoly he challenged. Dragged through the streets covered with mire and blood, he escaped as if by miracle the death with which he was constantly threatened.

Then came the secret offer of Charles II, from his security in France: £500 on the word of a Christian king, to the brave man who should remove the Protector from his tight-rope eminence by any means, poison specifically mentioned. Thereupon Cromwell's revolutionists began a ruthless suppression of all public meetings outside the orthodox church. Ignoring the civil tumult and the prohibition, the Quakers continued their usual worship, and Fox was arrested. It was this situation which introduced him to the Dictator.

Pepys frequently has a sly good word for Oliver's stern soldiers, and Colonel Hacker's military tribunal before which Fox was brought exercised extraordinary patience and restraint toward the Quaker, discussing religion, and finally advising him to go home, keep quiet, and avoid trouble. "I told Colonel Hacker if I should promise him this, it would manifest I was guilty of something, to make my home a prison. Therefore I should go to meetings as the Lord should order me, and could not submit to their requirings; but I said, we were a peaceable people."

"Well, then," said Colonel Hacker, "I will send you tomorrow morning by six o'clock to my Lord Protector."

Captain Drury, his guard, allowed Fox to break the journey, visiting prisons along the road, to encourage to steadfastness the Quakers always to be found there. Then, lodging his charge in the famous "Mermaid" in London, he proceeded to get the Protector's orders.

"When he came back he told me the Protector required that I should promise not to take up a carnal sword against him or the government as it then was. I said little in reply to Captain Drury." Fox was waiting for bigger game, waiting to match the power of God against the commander of the English army.

I was moved of God to write a paper to the Protector . . . wherein I did in the presence of the Lord God declare . . . that I denied the drawing of any carnal weapon against him or any man, that I was sent of God to stand a witness against all violence to bring people from the causes of war and fighting to the peaceable gospel. I set my name to it and gave it to Captain Drury to hand to Oliver Cromwell, which he did.

Cromwell sent for Fox to discover what manner of man this was, who above the tumult of violence boldly proclaimed the gospel of peace. Into Cromwell's room before he was dressed, came the Quaker. "I was moved to say 'Peace be in this house.'" (Peace was the one thing lacking to the great Cromwell, even in the grave. His body, laid to rest with regal pomp, was to be pried from the quiet of Westminster Abbey, ignominiously hanged on the gallows, and scrapped in the potter's field.)

"I spoke to him much of truth," continues Fox, "and much discourse I had with him about religion, wherein he carried himself very moderately. But he said we quarreled with his priests, whom he called ministers. I told him I did not quarrel with them, but that they quarreled with me and my Friends."

Cromwell, who in moments of irritation had characterized the clergy as wolves, probably suppressed a twinkle. It had been easier to put the fear of God into the rulers of Europe than toleration into the hearts of his coreligionists.

I showed him that the prophets, Christ, and the apostles declared freely [without money] . . . and against such as preached for filthy lucre and divined for money . . . and were covetous and greedy and could never have enough. . . . As I spoke he several times said it was very good, and it was the truth. . . . But people coming in I drew a little back. As I was turning, he caught me by the hand, and with tears in his eyes said, "Come again to my house, for if thou and I were but an hour of a day together, we should be nearer one to another," adding that he wished me no more harm than he did his own soul. I told him if he did he wronged his own soul; and admonished him to hearken to God's voice, that would keep him from hardness of heart, but if he did not hear God's voice, his heart would be hardened. He said it was true. Then I went out; and when Captain Drury came out after me he told me the Lord Protector said I was at liberty, and might go where I would.

George Fox was not the sort to be caught in a trap.

I was brought into a great hall, where the Protector's gentlemen were to dine. I asked them what they brought me thither for. They said it was by the Lord Protector's order, that I might dine with them. I bid them let the Protector know that I would not eat of his bread or drink of his drink. When he heard this he said, "Now I see there is a people risen that I cannot win with gifts or honors, offices or places; all other sects and peoples I can."

The old rebel, quitting the fray, was less concerned with his outraged personal dignity when he received Fox's curt message than with the pleasing conviction that a breed of courageous rebels would survive his passing.

Fox was cantering through Hyde Park when he spied Cromwell riding in state surrounded by his Life Guard, and was moved of the spirit to give chase. He must have presented a spectacle not unlike an Indian chief in an Easter Day parade on the avenue. There is no hint that he attempted singularity in his attire, nor any doubt that he attained it. Wandering in poverty from John o' Groat's to Land's End in all weathers, riding sixty miles to hold a meeting, gathering bracken to make a pillow for his bed on the ground, sheltering himself from snow and rain in haymows, he needed serviceable raiment. In leather breeches, umbrella hat, and cowboy hair-cut, this extraordinary figure charged into Cromwell's Life Guard, which naturally hastened to intercept him.

But he forbade them. So I rode by his coach declaring what the Lord gave me to say to him, of his condition, and of the suffering of Friends in the nation, showing him how contrary persecution was to the words of Christ. . . . When we came to James's Park Gate I left him, and at parting he desired me to come to his house. Next day one of his wife's maids came to see me, and told me her master came to her, and said he would tell her some good news, "George Fox is come to town." She replied, "That is good news indeed," but she said she could hardly believe it till he told her how I had met him, and rode from Hyde Park to James's Park Gate with him.

Rumor had it that Cromwell was to be crowned king, and Fox promptly protested. "I was moved to go to him and warn him against accepting it; and of divers dangers which, if he did not avoid them, would bring shame and ruin on himself and his posterity. He seemed to take well what I said."

One last encounter between these soldiers in the war for the liberation of humanity.

I met him riding in Hampton Court Park, and before I came to him, as he rode at the head of his Life Guard, I saw and felt a waft of death go forth against him, and when I came to him he looked like a dead man. After I had laid the sufferings of Friends before him, and warned him, he bade me come to his house. But when I came he was sick. . . . So I passed away and never saw him more.

So met and parted the two great revolutionists of their time, who fought, each according to his light, with personal sacrifice and dauntless courage, that liberty might have wider space. One, resisting force with force, taught kings to be a little more careful; the other, opposing injustice with unyielding moral force, taught ecclesiastics to be a little more tolerant. The strength of the union of church and state was weakened, and forever after both institutions walked more circumspectly all their days.

New Morals for Old

Modern Love and Modern Fiction

By J. W. KRUTCH

SEEING upon the jacket of a recent book the legend "Solves the Sex Problem," my first reaction was a fervent hope that it did nothing of the sort, for I had no desire that fiction should be rendered supererogatory or, what is the same thing, that life should be made a less difficult art. Problems of housing, wages, taxation, militarism, and the like may be solved, temporarily at least, but what a contemporary writer has called "the irony of being two" is a sufficient guaranty of one never-to-be-resolved complexity. Until each individual of the human species becomes a complete biological entity, until, that is to say, hermaphroditism is universal, there can be no fear lest we should cease to live dangerously.

After all, the things we do are both more significant and less changing than our attitude toward our acts. We burn men at the stake to light a Roman garden, to save the world from the horror of heresy, or to protect the sanctity of female virtue and assure the supremacy of the white race, but we burn them always; we fight because arms are glorious, because the service of God demands the rescue of His holy sepulcher from the infidel, or because we must make the world safe for peace, but always we fight; and the most important thing is the insistent lust of cruelty or the impulse to fight rather than the rationalization of these motives. So, too, with love. Paphnutius is harried out of apathy into a state in which he sees visions because of the temptations of the devil, Milton because God gave Eve to Adam as a comforter, Shelley because woman is the symbol of the unutterable, and Shaw (presumably) because only by the process of reproduction can the Life Force perform its perfectionist experiments; but the resultant impulses are not so very different. Mr. F. W. Myers once referred to the procreation of children in these lines:

Lo! When a man magnanimous and tender,
Lo! When a woman desperate and true,
Make the inevitable sweet surrender,
Show one another what the Lord can do, . . .

but I doubt if the states of mind which called forth these lines and, say, Swinburne's Dolores were as different as the verses would suggest or as the authors imagined. Without going so far as to say that the two poems are of equal literary merit, one can at least say that they are almost equally interesting and delightful to the observer of life or art and that as long as the mystical, the ascetic, the sentimental, and the biological attitudes toward love continue to exist side by side or to follow one another in succeeding epochs, the critic will not find literature either dull or monotonous.

If at the end of a period of twenty-five years during which fiction has frankly concerned itself to an unusual degree with sex the problem seems more complicated than ever before, there is no cause for surprise. Even the specious pretense that a solution has been found can only be maintained when, as during the Victorian era, the mass of men agree to assume that no difficulties exist which are not solvable by that rule of thumb known as the social and moral code, and insist that sexual battles shall be fought out behind closed doors in life and between the chapters in books. By dragging them out into public view we have been able, no doubt, to palliate some of the commoner tragedies of stupidity. But chiefly we have been upon a voyage of discovery, and it ought to be evident now, if it has never been evident before, that we cannot possibly solve the problem because its most important aspects are not social but human. They have their roots in man's ironic predicament between gorilla and angel, a predicament perfectly typified by the fact that as he grows critical he realizes that love is at once sublime and obscene and that only by walking a spiritual tight-rope above the abysses can he be said to live at all in any true sense. The very fact that the social aspects can to a certain extent be worked out makes them less interesting and explains the fact that those novels intended to prove, for example, that the mother of an illegitimate child may still be within the human pale have come to seem so unutterably dull. No doubt they "did good," but like all forms of useful literature their life was short. By far the most interesting contemporary writers who deal chiefly with sex are largely concerned with the individual problem.

Thanks partially to modern fiction we have attained a certain measure of freedom. But freedom, as everybody who understands either the meaning of the word or the value of the thing knows, raises problems instead of settling them. It is true that our attitude has changed. There is hardly a serious contemporary novel which does not take for granted things which would have outraged even liberal thinkers of the past century, and the changes have been mostly in the direction of clarification. It would be impossible for anyone today to fail to see, as George Eliot failed to see, that the natural working of the "inevitable moral law" which punished Hetty Sorrel was neither inevitable nor natural. The things which happened to her came entirely from society and not at all from nature, so that the story which the author meant to be a tragedy of the ineluctable becomes merely a description of human stupidity. So, too, we are clearer on other things; we are not quite so hopelessly at sea as we once were when it comes to distinguishing between frigidity and chastity or purity and prudishness. But these things mean only that more choices are open to us, that we have come to see that sexual conduct cannot be guided or judged by a few outwardly applied standards, and that, accordingly, the conduct of life has been made more thrillingly difficult.

Most sex novels of the past have been concerned chiefly with what might be called the right to love. They have combated an extremely old idea which Christianity found congenial and embodied in the conception of love as a part of the curse pronounced upon man at the Fall, and hence at best a necessary evil. They have been compelled solemnly to assure us that the early Christian Fathers were wrong in assuming that the human race would have been better off if it had been able to propagate itself by means of some harmless system of vegetation, and they have had to fly in the face of all laws and social customs which are seen, if examined closely, to rest upon the assumption that desire is merely a dangerous nuisance, fatal to efficiency and order, and hence to be regimented at any cost. It is now pretty generally admitted among the educated class that love is legitimate, even that it has an aesthetic as well as a utilitarian function. We have got back to the point which Ovid had reached some two thousand years ago of realizing that there is an art of love. During the next quarter of a century fiction will be concerned, I think, more with the failure or success of individuals to attain this art than with the exposition of theses which most accept.

No doubt some of the more naively enthusiastic crusaders really believed that as soon as man was freed from the more grossly stupid restrictions from without and from the artificially cultivated inhibitions within, love would become simple and idyllic, but one needs look only at the books of D. H. Lawrence or Aldous Huxley to be relieved of this stupid delusion. The characters of both of these authors have long ago ceased to care what law or society thinks and they are surely untroubled by traditional asceticism, but their problems are not less acute. Indeed it is just because these novelists are so completely concerned with love as a personal matter that they are the freshest of those contemporary writers with whom sex is the dominant interest. Each is concerned with something fundamental—the one with the problem of the adjustment of personalities and the other with the evaluation of sexual love.

If by "immoral" is meant "tending to excite lubricity," then nothing could be more absurd than the opinion, apparently held by some, that the books of these men are immoral. They are so completely unable to lose themselves carelessly in passion and so insistent upon the need of adjusting it somehow to the other interests of life that they strike one as more like saints than like gallants, and their books are far more chilling than inflammatory. Huxley and Joyce try to laugh sex away, but their scorn of the flesh suggests Erasmus more than Rabelais, and, as for Lawrence, his novels constitute so solemn a warning that one imagines him as thoroughly bored with the exigencies of passion and more likely to make his disciples celibates than debauchés.

In Lawrence's morbidly sensitive and exaggeratedly individualistic characters one sees as through a magnifying-glass the thousand impingements of personality upon personality which make love more and more difficult as it becomes more intimate and personal. His people, like Schopenhauer's porcupines, are continually coming together for warmth only to find themselves pricked by one another's quills and to part snarling, so that his perpetual prayer is a "Lord deliver us from this need which can be neither stilled nor satisfied." And abnormal though he is, his abnormality is one of degree only, for when sexual love is developed beyond the impulse of the animal and desires the contact of spirit as well as body that contact is bound to be both incomplete and painful.

Nor is the even more fundamental problem with which Aldous Huxley is concerned likely ever to receive a permanent or a general solution. He is in search of love, but he can find only ridiculous and obscene biological facts, for love, like God and the other most important human possessions, does not exist. It is an illusion created by the effort of the imagination to transform the unsatisfactory materials which life has furnished it into something acceptable to the soul; but being an illusion, it is unstable and perpetually tending, if not created anew, to dissolve into its elements. The racial need for the continuation of the species and the individual need for the satisfaction of a physiological impulse exist, but they are hard, unsatisfying realities, and the struggle of mankind is to create some fiction which will as far as possible include and at the same time transcend them.

And nothing derogatory is, of course, meant by the word "fiction." All that distinguishes man from nature is such a fiction, and it is by his insistent belief in these imaginary things that civilization has been created. All of Mr. Huxley's books are confessions, first cynically triumphant and then despairing, of his inability to be poet or mystic or ironist enough to achieve this transcendence and find in his animal heritage a satisfaction for his spiritual needs. Like everyone else, he is compelled to love, and love implies a certain amount of idealization. How, he asks in effect, is he to poetize this ridiculous function, which he shares with the beasts, and concerning which science is constantly presenting us with an increasing amount of disillusioning knowledge? Exercising the most perverse ingenuity in confronting romance with biology and in establishing the identity (in the realm of fact) of love and lust, he has continually tracked the trail of the beast into the holy of holies—but only because it hurt him so much to find it there. The obscenities in which he seems to revel are defiances of the inner idealist who has dared to assimilate the loathsome trivialities of sex into something capable of satisfying spiritual desires. When he sings one of his philosopher's songs or when, in "Antic Hay," he describes some particularly revolting orgy there is nothing new in the psychological state which provokes his obscenity. His attitude is a result of failure to reconcile physical fact with spiritual feeling. He is not far from Huysmans, who ended the preface of "A Rebours" with a quotation: "For the man who has written such a book there are only two alternatives—a pistol or the foot of the cross." But Huysmans was wrong. Anatole France and James Branch Cabell are not less sophisticated, but through the perfection of sophistication they have achieved a peaceful irony in which they can worship a non-existent God and believe again in the illusions they create. Huxley, too sophisticated for simple faith and too downright for ironic worship, is lost.

When the conception of love is, as it has tended to be in modern times, legalistic, these problems are submerged. As long as marriage is a matter of contract, the importance of the inward harmony of personalities is of the slightest, for children may be begotten and reared whether the parents love or hate. As long as passion is generally conceded to be but a shameful concession to unregenerate humanity, the average man is not likely to be concerned if he finds that the ideal of the poets is not realized in his own nuptial couch. But when love is free and unashamed then it is made ten times more difficult, for lives are recognized as frank failures which once would have seemed useful and satisfactory. Fiction, too, becomes, not more interesting, but more important. It ceases completely to be what it always tends to be when opinion is fixed, namely, a mere illustration of the working out of social or moral "laws"; it becomes frankly the record of individual souls in search of a successful way of life. It records, no doubt, more failures than successes, but it furnishes the best and perhaps only really important material for the study of that art of life which grows ever more complicated as we demand that it be more complete and beautiful.

Art Young At the Front

In the Spotlight

Mr. Scott, the only Wisconsin delegate who voted for Coolidge.

Dignity's Finest Flower

Cause and Effect

MONDELL: We are met as representatives of a great political party that . . . has never proposed nor advocated an unwise or unsound national policy . . . (At this point a member of the band fell out of the stand.)

Hard Boiled

A composite portrait of the Republican Convention after surveying the faces of three hundred delegates.

Smiling California

She brought the blessings of California's women to "Cal."

The Storm Center

"Throw 'em out! We don't want no radicals."

No Place to Go

Mr. Lodge appeared to be looking for a political house of refuge.

Another War Victim

By IDA TREAT

FRENCH enthusiasm for sport dates from the war. It may be that the war itself was directly responsible for the renaissance of sport, or it may be that it was merely another manifestation of the obscure law that fosters the continuity of a race and is popularly supposed to increase the stock of boy babies after periods of slaughter. Sport today in France looks very like a semi-conscious effort toward new vigor on the part of a nation whose physical deterioration was prepared by the Napoleonic wars and all but achieved in the last great conflict. Official encouragement—the War Department is the patron of physical education—and the propaganda of the Be-Healthy-in-Order-to-Breed societies had nothing to do with the origin of the movement.

Anyone who knew France before the war is well aware that the average young Frenchman was far from being a sportif. The characteristic build of the middle-class school-boy—slender, stooped, narrow chested, pale—was sufficient evidence of sedentary habits and lack of exercise. Athletics were pretty generally considered to be a pastime for barbarians, entailing an unpleasant degree of heat and sweat and an expenditure of energy disproportionate to any conceivable gain.

The Frenchman has always preferred forms of recreation that give definite results for a definite amount of effort. In a word, he has always insisted on getting his money's worth; like the lover in the old soldier song, he hates to have

Dépensé mes ors et mes argents
Sans en avoir eu . . . aucun agrément!

Of the only sports tolerated by the wealthy, horseback-riding was a convenient means of locomotion, fencing was essential for affairs of honor, and hunting and fishing—where exertion could be reduced to the minimum with game-beaters, gun-carriers, and the like—guaranteed the most concrete of premiums to skill. Hunting and fishing were popular with all classes: the latter being in particular a "poor man's sport." In the North nearly every commune has its chasse banale stretching conveniently along the border of the wealthy proprietor's chasse gardée. In the South, every man is a pescophile. The less pragmatic sports met with less enthusiasm, though pelote basque had its devotees in the Spanish Pyrenees, and certain provincial cities—notably Toulouse—counted Rugby as a local specialty, along with sausages and paté and violets.

Since the war that has all been changed. All over the country sociétés sportives have sprung up as if by magic. Groups of university students, young business men, and factory workers—girls, too, markedly self-conscious in their abbreviated costumes—have organized athletic fields in the city suburbs which they people daily with sportifs in striped blazers and running pants. Every Sunday they streak the landscape with cross countrys. They play basketball and Rugby. Tennis is no longer the prerogative of Anglophiles and snobs. Bicycling and boating have had a resurrection.

The sporting craze has found a literary echo. This month two Rugby novels appear simultaneously: Marcel Berger's "Histoire de Quinze Hommes" and Jean Bernier's "Tête de Mêlée."

Today the Gaul has gone in for "pure" sport; but that fact does not imply that he has altered his philosophy. He still demands a definite recompense for his effort; in short, he plays to win. Victory, applause, and glory are today substitutes for trout and partridges. For him sport is a serious business, not a mere outlet for joyous energy and youthful vigor. To his classical sense the rules of the game are sacred: he allows no deviation. With this in mind one can partly explain the incidents that marked the Franco-American Rugby game at the Colombes stadium on May 18—incidents that have stirred up a frenzy of controversy all over Paris and have been so discreetly glossed over by a cautioned press. However, the responsibility for these incidents does not rest solely with French philosophy.

One might have thought that the French sporting craze would find its apotheosis in the Olympic Games. At any rate they received a tremendous amount of advertising in the press and were particularly welcomed by hotel-keepers and hordes of Parisians who schemed to increase their income by renting rooms at twenty to fifty francs daily—official rates—to the expected sportsman. As it has turned out, the swarms of visitors have failed to appear—a bitter disappointment to the householder who had set up beds in every corner of his apartment, at no small profit to the furniture dealer. It could scarcely be expected that this same aggrieved householder would make a sympathetic spectator at Colombes. But again, his attitude is only partly responsible for the events of that Sunday.

As for the Olympic Games, popular opinion has it that they have turned out to be a four (read, "fizzle"). Is it merely a question of faulty organization, or does not the real truth lie deeper? Has not the world lost interest in Olympic games?

For four long years the nations played a game of their own, bloodier and more savage than Franco-American Rugby, and infinitely more absorbing. Today, the nations have not lost their war psychology: they have carried it over into their sports. France, always the frankest of nations, shows this with greater clearness than other, more reticent, countries. Besides, the eighth Olympiad is being held in Paris.

For, in spite of the pleasant things that have been said so often of late about international sport "cementing international friendship," sport today is not international. That, it seems to me, was the chief lesson of the Colombes Rugby game. Sport today is national as war is; it is even chauvinistic. It contributes to national glory. The athletes of our particular country are superior to yours because our stock, our training, and our ideals are superior to yours. Because of this superiority, our athletes (or our army) must always be victorious. Only foul means can defeat them (submarines, poison gas, and slugging). The game is an attack on the honor, traditions, and ideals of our particular nation. The opponent is an enemy.

That was the frame of mind of the crowd at Colombes that lynched in spirit, if not in fact, every member of the victorious American team.

Perhaps the American team did slug, or, rather, undoubtedly it did; and as the anger of the spectators grew noisier, it probably slugged harder. The Frenchmen for their part retorted by kicking and biting. As for the crowd, when their heroes, one by one, were carried bleeding or unconscious to the side-lines, it rocked and roared under the low May sky. Women in the bleachers shrieked instructions as to what anatomical portions of their visitors they wished destroyed. Somewhat bewildered by so vocal a display of hostility, the Americans played doggedly on; they too had a "national honor" at stake. And they continued to roll up a considerable score in their favor. Then the crowd lost its wits completely. High up on the stand a man in white, presumably an American, was clubbed to insensibility. Dead, the first rumor had it, a rumor greeted with howls of joy. A limp white figure was carried off on a stretcher in the wake of two unconscious French players. At last the game was over. Then came the American anthem. New pandemonium. Ten yards from the trombone not a note could be heard. One policeman was seen shrieking threats to America and Americans; another squatted on his heels—a gesture greatly appreciated by the crowd—until the brass band had ceased its dumb show.

Was this an anti-American demonstration—a manifestation of savagery peculiarly French? Or was it merely an indication that the war has laid its bloody fingers on another of our dear illusions, crushing it to atoms? "For it isn't only the French," a Parisian friend assures me. "The British are just as bad. They too have lost the old sporting spirit; all they want is to win."

Which reminds me of a war story. In the first months of the war, when there was little animosity between combatants, there was a good deal of fraternization between the lines. At Christmas there was even a Rugby game. The young Englishman who told the story showed photographs.

"Who won?" someone inquired.
"The Germans," came the answer. "And it was a damned good thing for our morale. We found that out when we began fighting again, next day!"
Not a bright future for international sport!

In the Driftway

WITH a humble heart and a mind that ought to be convinced if it isn't, the Drifter offers his readers the thoughts of a man who seems to have earned the right to call the Drifter a few rather harsh names. "Dear Drifter," are the deceptively mild words with which his letter begins:

* * * * *

THIS is black treason against the eyes of youth. This is old age with a vengeance. I speak of your proposed legislation in the issue of June 4 against the travel of children.

I must have been one of those pampered children you speak of. I was taken to Europe at the age of six, and again at the age of twelve, and yet again at the age of eighteen. I traveled on a sleeping-car fairly early; and I saw Paris before I was allowed to eat pastry at supper time. Well I remember how at Number 4, Ford Road, London, my brother and I finished the day at tea time—bread and jam and those things—and had to go to bed by day while my sister and the old folks still had another meal to look forward to.

And now you, you old codger, are trying to tell me that I had my thrills before I could enjoy them and have been spoiled from ever a thrill again. As for the former I warrant you my first trip down New York harbor—it was on the Columbia, and I was bursting with the pride of her three stacks as against the two of the ship my grandparents were sailing on—will never be excelled in all my life, and what thrill I get out of later trips will borrow something from the surpassing wonder of that day. The ship, inside, was in a turmoil because the old folks were scrambling to see this steward and that steward for chairs and table seats—you know how it is—while I was allowed to have only a fleeting glimpse of the harbor that smelled so strange and so good. But I remember it was misty, that the water was gray and oily, and that we passed a bell buoy. Good heavens, man, do you think a person of twenty-five can get a real kick out of a bell buoy! And I saw icebergs on that trip, six of them one after another; and I saw Lough Foyle on a sunny Irish morning in June; and I saw enough wild roses on my sister's birthday in Antrim to make every subsequent sight of blossoms only a thing to be compared to that one. And I smelled the soft coal smoke all through England, until the smell of it today always brings a little grip at the heart—like the wattles round Lichtenberg, I suppose. And I heard the donkeys on a Sunday morning tethered on the Avenue de Neuilly outside of Paris; and I drove home many evenings past the Arc de Triomphe with carriages and people all busily going somewhere; and I got lost one day in the Hotel Cluny—and I guess you couldn't duplicate that thrill at twenty-five!

* * * * *

WELL, I wish I could make you do penance for your treason by reciting every one of all the thrills that come back to me in endless procession as I sit here and allow them to come. Pampered? Well, perhaps; but I can swap school stories with any stay-at-home boy I've ever met, out of the year my brother and I spent at Taplow Grammar School, Taplow, Bucks. The rod was often and the food was scant, and the bath water soiled through not having been drawn for me alone! There was Headmaster Rogers, who was in liquor too often and sang in a bass voice at the exercises, and Breen, who used a piece of kindling on me one day out in the drill yard, and Peter, the head boy, and—oh, well, why tell you, who would have had me at home in a Philadelphia suburb "preparing for romance"!

And well I can afford to flout your sympathy, old dear. For today is my little girl's first birthday, and on Tuesday my boy will be three years old. Just last Saturday I was in Englewood Station at Chicago, seeing them off with their mother and grandmother to Philadelphia. It was the Pennsylvania Limited. I used to watch the Pennsylvania Limited go west through Narberth, Pennsylvania, way back in 1905. The thrill is still with me, in spite of you. Number 2 was some ten cars long last Saturday, riding behind the Pennsylvania's finest looking brute, a K-4. Do you know the K-4, you expert in thrills? I'll be in New York this summer and will gladly make a trip to Newark with you, if your early travels have really deprived you of the joy of knowing what kind of engine you ride behind.

As I said, Donny is three and Margaret is one, and in just five years, or even four, they'll take their first sea trip, and it will be out of New York harbor, because that's the finest thing in America, and you can come to see us off, if you will, and I will show you, through the eyes of youth, what you may once have known but have since forgotten—the mystery, the fear, and the beloved solemnity, to a little boy, of the world that moves.

Sympathetically yours, for early traveling,
D. E. MONTGOMERY

* * * * *

ALL of which leads the Drifter to muse rather mournfully on the possibility, in some long future, of turning over his robes of office to a new Drifter whose name will be Donny—or perhaps even Margaret.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Casualty in France

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I quote from The Nation, April 30, page 495: "What they call 'economic soundness' may mean a new kind of industrial slavery, but it is at least better than an era of new wars."

That sentence—from you—has slain my infant and milk-fed liberal faith. It was born on the heights of the Gerardmer Training Sector in September, 1918—strangely enough assisted by the same hand that now does murder: a stray copy of The Nation. And now the sage femme of that delivery, who since has served faithfully as wet-nurse, drops a poison drug in the milk!

A rather intelligent Catholic of Czechy put it to me in this way:

The organized Catholic church may have meant a system of ecclesiastical slavery for Europe, but has it not proved better for the masses than the confusion and strife resulting from the doctrines of free interpretation and direct responsibility to God? After all, it is true that Jesus was a revolutionist, but one cannot exist forever in a state of revolution: order must succeed confusion, and order means—authority.

"Leave us in peace, torment us not!" . . . Evil's plea throughout the ages.

"Business (not Youth) must be served!" and Asia, India, Africa, yea, and the islands of the sea, are converts to this "economic soundness" which is another spelling of industrial slavery—converts at the point of the bayonet.

"Give us a king!" the tribes cried. Well, why not? This freedom is perhaps too solid a diet for such as we milk-fed. Economic security, at a price. Who knows the terms made by the Commission and Poincaré and Morgan? A bank r's peace—the patent medicine that makes us sleep again. But then, perhaps, The Nation is tired out by these six long years' struggle to keep the child alive—it cried so in the night! Well, it's better dead than a slave to drugs like that.

Bordeaux, May 7

ELIA, Junior

The Doctors' Union

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation for April 30 together with the Detroit Academy of Surgery gave a sharp dig to the Ford hospital of Detroit. I take it that your attitude is due to the fact that you feel under obligations to stand by the doctors' trade union, and the doctors certainly do not want anyone to interfere with their methods of polite banditry.

I am no publicity agent for Mr. Ford, but it seems to me the working people who are so unlucky as to fall sick should have a word. Anyone who has been stung by modern hospitals and doctors must greet the Ford plan with a shout of joy. His idea is simply to protect sick and injured employees from being exploited by doctors, nurses, and hospitals. The modern cost of sickness is appalling and unnecessary. If you can find an honest doctor he may possibly admit that none but the very rich and the very poor can afford to be sick and have adequate care. The rich can meet their bills, the very poor are charity patients, but what about the rest of us? I know case after case of those of moderate incomes who must go shabby and pinched after serious illness because of exorbitant medical charges. They are decent people who pay their debts, but they certainly know the medical profession has them "on the hip." If there is any plan—even a Ford plan—to lessen the middle-class terror of illness and its consequent exploitation I believe there are millions of people who will cry "Bring it on."

Berkeley, California, May 25

R. WHEELER

A Vote for Coolidge

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I cannot agree with your editorial entitled Mr. Coolidge Rampant in your issue of May 7. That is, I agree with everything but your demand for the defeat of Mr. Coolidge.

Mr. Coolidge is the true representative of the average mind in our land since the war for democracy. His ideals, his mental state, everything, prove him to be "the average." So why shouldn't he win? If he is the true pattern of the great majority, why should he be defeated, unless, perhaps, we have ceased being a government of the majority?

Over 36,000 people paid to see the opening game in Cincinnati on April 15 and thousands were turned away. Over 27,000 paid to see the game on May 4 at Cincinnati. "Abie's Irish Rose," a play reaching the very lowest depths of mediocrity, was sold out for twelve weeks here, breaking all records. Boxing contests are packed all the time. On the other hand we cannot support even a weekly labor paper. Schildkraut played to an empty house and "The Fool" was nearly a failure.

People let out their thinking. They are static mentally and politically. They want to be let alone. This is why our President should be elected; he wonderfully represents the vast majority of our people.

Cincinnati, May 5

NICHOLAS KLEIN

More Midsummer Madness

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A gentleman of substance and standing, born in Russia but long since naturalized an American, wishes to adopt his cousin, at present an orphan in one of the state orphan homes in Odessa, and has applied to the Russian Red Cross to assist him to bring the twelve-year-old boy to the United States.

The Russian Government, before issuing the boy a passport to go knocking about the world, desires to know whether there is any assurance that he will not be detained at Ellis Island and then sent back to Russia. Inquiry reveals that if the boy is permitted to come to Constantinople he will there be supplied, for a consideration, with a passport issued by the representative of the Provisional Government of Russia headed by Alexander Kerensky, and that such a passport will be duly honored by the United States authorities. A passport issued him by the only Government that has functioned in Russia, anywhere, for the past four years will not be honored.

To the matter-of-fact Russian Soviet Government this seems somewhat too complicated a proceeding, and so the boy remains in an overcrowded institution in the Ukrainian Republic.

A young Russian in the American army during the war died carrying $10,000 war-risk insurance. His next of kin is his father, seventy years old, living in Saratov, Russia. For three years the combined efforts of the American and Russian Red Cross societies have tried to cut their way through the red tape of the Veterans' Bureau and get the old man his money. But the ruling is that the necessary papers must be executed before an American consular officer—and of course there is none in darkest Russia. A British consular officer whose signature and seal would be duly authenticated by the British Prime Minister and his in turn by the American Ambassador to Great Britain would not do. So the seventy-year-old father whose son died for "the absolute principle of self-sacrifice" that his loyalty to his adopted land imposed must travel five days and four nights, bringing with him two neighbors to prove his identity, in order to receive the evidence of that care with which America protected those dependent upon her defenders.

But if you will consult the World Almanac you will find three Russian consuls general and four consuls in various cities of the United States. Who are these gentlemen?

New York, June 1

PAXTON HIBBEN

Books

McAdoo, Plunger

McAdoo: The Man and His Times, A Panorama in Democracy.
By Mary Synon. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

THE unforeseen ramifications of the oleaginous archaeology initiated by Senator La Follette and executed by Senators Walsh, Wheeler, and others seem likely to have converted this book, intended as a prompt and opportune campaign biography, into a political obituary.

Miss Synon confines herself almost entirely to an account of McAdoo's activities as secretary of the treasury. There is a brief review of his early life, and more detail upon his triumph in building the Hudson tubes and linking them up with the traction system of the metropolis; but the emphasis is upon the establishment of the federal reserve system, the creation of the merchant marine, the beginnings of rural credits, the floating of the Liberty Loans, the loans to the Allied countries, and government administration of railroads. There is a complete and, perhaps, significant silence concerning McAdoo's achievements since 1919. The book concludes with the following paragraph:

In January, 1919, McAdoo left Washington. The President had gone abroad, evangelizing his crusade for a lasting peace. Under the softness of an early Southern spring-time forsythia was blossoming on the Hill. Over the land brooded the peace which he had done his part to win. To a country triumphant, vindicated, dedicated, he faced forward, one of its private citizens. Through the years of its trial he had been steward of such wealth as Midas never dreamed, had held such power as Caesar never knew. . . . He could look back across the Plaza to the white mass of the Capitol, luminous in the golden light of noon, and lift his head in pride that he had kept the faith of the fathers of the Republic.

How tragic and incongruous for the odor of petroleum to intrude upon this idyl! Nor are we informed at all concerning certain elements of unsoundness in McAdoo's financial policies and methods, the tremendous mistake of the merchant marine, or the colossal graft subtly saddled on the country by railroad owners under government administration.

It is rare that a man can survive a campaign biography, but Mr. McAdoo emerges fairly creditably even from this rather gushy eulogy. There can be no doubt of his possession of originality, courage even to the margin of rashness, great energy, somewhat striking qualities of leadership, no little personal charm, real administrative ability, genuine political, social, and economic liberalism, and a truly sympathetic understanding of modern problems, coupled with a fine sense of justice and fair dealing. That he possesses some weaknesses must be conceded, among them the fact that the trend toward audacity and adventure and the element of the "plunger" in him might at times disturb the soundness of his judgment, and a suspicion that 100 per cent sincerity is not to be detected in all of his public utterances. Witness the associate of Palmer, one who not only was aware of the enormous frauds and profiteering during the war but one who had given publicity to their revelation, telling the treasury officials upon his retirement: "I go out of public life with a most intense admiration for our institutions, their value and their power. Their inspiration and their idealism have been revindicated and set forward as a result of this Great War." Hear the would-be recipient of the million-dollar Doheny fee declaring in 1924: "For the last three years we have witnessed a complete degradation of idealism in America. That noble idealism which marked the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, all the ideals he represented were jeered at during the last election—an exaltation of materialism. We are now reaping the inevitable fruits of political and moral debauchery." But, after all, what sincere man has ever succeeded as a public leader in a democracy, unless his sincerity has been inextricably intertwined with impressive stupidity?

On the whole, however, it appears that Mr. McAdoo, aside from inferiority in academic training in political science and in rhetorical talent and resourcefulness, can lay more genuine claim to the position of logical leader of the liberal and constructive forces in the Democratic Party than Woodrow Wilson could substantiate. He possesses fully as great capacity as a leader and organizer of men and party groups, much more human and social geniality and attractiveness, far greater power to arouse and retain a warm personal following, an infinitely greater acquaintance with, and grasp upon, the fundamental realities in modern American life and problems, and vast superiority as regards physical energy and administrative capacity. And his progressivism is more genuine and long-standing and far less opportunist than that of Mr. Wilson. The essence of the whole matter seems to be that in 1919 Mr. McAdoo was confronted with the alternative of the assurance of accumulating a large personal pecuniary fortune or a reasonable probability of becoming President of the United States on March 4, 1925. With the characteristic optimism of the plunger and promoter he took a gambling chance upon the possibility of gobbling both of these enviable objectives.

The fact that his retention as counsel for Doheny should be regarded as more of a political disqualification than Coolidge's sitting without protest through the cabinet meetings at which the oil lands were abstracted from the government, consorting with "Ned" McLean et al., and reluctance to dismiss Denby and Daugherty, is not to be explained on grounds of relative guilt or innocence, personal implication or responsibility, but on the basis of the psychology of the American people. The Demos can understand and extenuate the facts of graft, jobbery, log-rolling, and back-scratching, and appreciate why a man will protect his guilty friends and party associates, but they cannot comprehend how an honest man could ever earn a million-dollar legal fee. They find it easier and more palatable to weep affectionately at the bier of the late ex-editor of the Marion Star, who appointed and sponsored Daugherty and protected that scoundrel, "Charley" Forbes, while he made away with a quarter of a billion dollars intended for war cripples and their widows and orphans.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Creative Criticism

Many Minds. By Carl Van Doren. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

CARL VAN DOREN has written a fascinating guide-book to the American mind.

He begins, appropriately, with Mary Austin, the outstanding representative in our literature today of the intense and visionary and prophetic. The "folk-wisdom" of George Ade pleases him by its hardness and shrewdness; but he is well aware that it is directed by instinctive purpose against all that eccentrically departs from the traditional folk-norm. E. W. Howe, the corner-grocery philosopher par excellence, delights Mr. Van Doren by the rougher cynicism and the deeper malice with which he expresses this same folk-wisdom; and the limitations of this cynicism are so obvious that Mr. Van Doren takes them for granted, without troubling himself to state them.

If these represent the prose of the American folk-spirit, Robert Frost may be said to have discovered the poetry of it among the dwindling farm-population of New England, where its chief merits are those that spring from the homely honesty with which a traditional destiny is accepted.

These merits, which Mr. Van Doren evaluates with such tact and tolerance for a generation of readers who have learned to be impatient of them, hark back decidedly to New England history; George Ade in Indiana and E. W. Howe in Kansas have not lost the Yankee twang to their wit. And of this Yankee spirit of order, which was at its best a sturdy utopian courage and only at its worst the puritan fanaticism of which we have heard so much, Professor Stuart P. Sherman is the contemporary propagandist. Following into the past, says Mr. Van Doren, "the trail of the written word," Professor Sherman has found that "the widest, most beaten, and least-interrupted trail led to Plymouth Rock."

To these exponents of order and common sense may be added George Santayana, that ironic castigator of the follies of romantic impulse; though his vision of order far transcends the narrow and harsh concepts of Yankee philosophy, he stands in this group merely as the representative of a more ancient and urbane conservatism.

But changes have come—not yesterday, nor wholly as an aftermath of the war: George Ade had already begun satirizing them in their more superficial aspects a quarter of a century ago. Yet fifteen years ago, if Mr. Van Doren had written such a book as this, he would have found this stubborn folk-conservatism in the saddle in our literature. Fifteen years ago the changed world in which we actually lived was viewed humorously, or with alarm, but scarcely with sympathy, by our writers. And if we have been thus slow to welcome and celebrate these changes, it does argue a temperamental conservatism in our folk. But that conservatism is not the last word, as the newest American literature shows.

Under the heading New Growths, the second half of Mr. Van Doren's book is given to examples of this sudden flowering of romance out of our hard Yankee soil. Romance means here the opposite of caution—a full-blooded acceptance of the whole of life, an acceptance of its dangers, too, and a refusal to let "success" and "failure" be the ultimate tests of living.

My candle burns at both ends;
It will not last the night;
But ah, my foes, and oh, my friends—
It gives a lovely light!

It is in this spirit that the possibilities of modern life are being explored; these new writers speak for their multitudes, too. Yet the roots of this romantic flowering are firmly set in the hard Puritan soil, and the sap which invigorates it came from those acrid juices of the ground. It has its own principles, and its own sternnesses, different from the old ones, but not alien to the spirit of them. It may in time come to be recognized as a new kind of puritanism; but at any rate, it is a new kind. It marks an effort toward a sort of order of which the boundaries are not yet known, because not yet reached. Meanwhile, this romantic spirit is reckless on theory as well as on impulse, and is finely tempered to endure the consequences of recklessness.

Of this new spirit the poetry of Edna St. Vincent Millay is the perfect and lucid lyrical expression; but it struggles to utterance in the tempestuous rhetoric of Vachel Lindsay and in the dithyrambs of Carl Sandburg. It has its prose moods, of which Heywood Brown is a whimsical and charming exponent, in his novels as well as in his journalism. And if one compares the humor of Ring Lardner with the humor of George Ade, one can hardly fail to perceive that the laugh is now on the other side of the mouth: it is folk-wisdom that is being satirized—exhibited very tenderly as a sublime stupidity.

To these and some few other emergent writers Mr. Van Doren devotes a hundred pages of swift and luminous description and analysis, and traces meanings which reach out far beyond the immediate area of discourse. Within the last few years, literary criticism in America has taken part in this romantic revival, and has been liberated from the narrow round of strictly literary and moral interests. Literature has been taken as a part of life; and it is, accordingly, with life, in its most salient aspects, that literary criticism now undertakes to deal. In doing so, however, it has often tended to become partisan and acrimonious. Because the issues with which it deals are live issues, of importance to us all, it has not always been possible to preserve the amenities. To this tendency Mr. Van Doren is the notable exception. Not less interested in controversial issues than H. L. Mencken, he nevertheless does not raise his voice above the conversational pitch, much less wave a tomahawk. Indeed, he presents the singular appearance, in this book, of a civilized man discussing literature with an equally civilized group of friends. His serenity of temper enables his thought to follow many an elusive truth into those crevices of nuance where it so often stays hidden from us more impatient ones.

FLOYD DELL

The Revolt in the Unions

Rebellion in Labor Unions. By Sylvia Kopald. Boni and Live-right. $2.

EVERY social movement is chronically engaged in a dual campaign. Its inner factions struggle, with varying moods of vindictiveness, for the control of its outer strategies. This is true even of such spiritually bankrupt movements as the two old parties or the doctrinal church. And it is, of course, especially true of such a significant and militant movement as labor. Until the war it was quite possible for the labor specialist to keep track of both fronts with most of their interlacing sectors. Since then, however, even in America, the labor movement has grown too complex. Accordingly we are rapidly developing a group of intra-labor students of European sophistication. And among them one of the more promising is Dr. Sylvia Kopald.

The story of labor's civil guerrilla warfare since the armistice still needs to be written. Miss Kopald's book is not, as the title may lead one to believe, a study of the New Radicalism in American labor and its defeat and changes by the sundry inquisitions and counter-reformations on the part of its official Sanhedrins. Her book merely deals with four typical case records of rank-and-file revolts against the cumulative neglect and reaction by their district or national leaders. Whatever local leaders sprang up spontaneously in these bread-and-butter outbursts were innocent of any radical philosophy. They knew nothing of Sorel or the war of the pamphlets between Kautsky and Lenin. But they did know that their work rules and hours and wages were growing relatively worse partly because the work rules and hours and wages of their leaders had created an economic disparity between them which it seemed impossible to bridge psychologically.

Miss Kopald chose her four illustrations very skilfully to cover the great organizational and psychological types of indigenous American labor. Her first sample is the revolt of the Illinois miners, an advanced industrial union, against the district machine of President Frank Farrington, in 1919; then the Outlaw Rail Strike of the same year, not a philosophical but a temperamental radical outburst, which registered the lightning rise and fall of a dual union in our most strategic industry; then the "vacation movement" among the New York City printers, an old-fashioned craft union as conservative as the Union League Club; and finally the newspaper web pressmen's strike in New York City last fall, in which the largest local in the trade was broken by an absentee labor oligarchy kept in power through an archaic senatorial system of elections. In these four epitomes Miss Kopald presents an excellent cinema of the growing restlessness even in some of the old and entirely English-speaking unions.

What is important and illuminating about these four rebellions is their common denominators. They were all "bread-and-butter" strikes, outbursts of cumulative grievances about hours and wages and especially about work rules. All four were directed not against the employers but against the big-union officials, whose oligarchy was growing ever less benevolent and vigilant and ever more bureaucratic. In all four cases these union leaders fought the insurgents with a catch-as-catch-can fury compared to which their conduct of strikes seems a squeamish Queensberry bout. In every case the leaders pretended to see in these rebellions not the explosions of exhausted patience, which they were, but red revolutions, which they were not. And each time they won by a knock-out. Major Berry—in whose trinitarian person is incorporated a leading American legionary, a Democratic vice-presidential candidate, and the president of the newspaper web pressmen—not only broke the New York strike by liquidating its local but actually signed away in the new agreement labor's central plank in its bill of rights, the right to strike. Yet Mr. Gompers, whose whole life has been spent in keeping our labor movement out of political expansion in the economic guerrilla warfare of the strike weapon, hailed the major as a hero, "who has engaged in a tremendous contest in the interest of the honor and integrity of the American labor movement"; which goes to show that while the masses of American labor are far from being class-conscious, their leaders are very definitely so.

Miss Kopald's book is a doctoral dissertation, but she never commits the main idolatry of the social-science dissertation: she shows no hesitancy of courage camouflaged as impartiality. She takes the stand that even in economics some things have been settled. Reactionary ideas on labor may need objective but they need no "impartial" analysis, any more than Elder Voliva's ideas on astronomy or Mr. Bryan's views on biology require the impartial analysis of physical or natural scientists. And for this iconoclasm Dr. Kopald deserves our gratitude.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

A Middle-Georgia Pioneer

Augustus Baldwin Longstreet: A Study of the Development of Culture in the South. By John Donald Wade. The Macmillan Company. $4.

THE name of Augustus Baldwin Longstreet is little known outside the South, but I believe there are few native Georgians over forty years of age who have not read his racy stories of old days in middle Georgia, collected under the title of "Georgia Scenes."

"Gus" Longstreet was born in Augusta in 1771, when that city had a population of 1,100 people. His father had a plantation fourteen miles from town over the South Carolina line, and here Gus and his brothers and sisters spent most of their childhood. "There one could go hunting, could fish, could go occasionally to a corn-shucking or to some other 'sociable'; and other things failing, could always watch the wagons that went passing and passing toward Augusta and sometimes toward far-away Baltimore."

In 1805 the family moved into Augusta, where Mrs. Longstreet opened a boarding-house, "private at first, but soon tolerably public." Adjoining the house was a store which partook of the nature of a "social center," as did most stores in pioneer days. Mr. Wade suggests that in this gathering-place it is likely that young Longstreet came to learn a good deal about what is known as "human nature." A contemporary writer describes such a store:

The liquor was dealt out in quantities to suit the purchaser. Much of it was sold by the half-pint and drunk at the counter. The custom was for the neighboring planters to meet at the store, wander in the beautiful groves, run quarter races, practice target-shooting, pitch quoits or silver dollars, talk until some one felt thirsty, and order a quart or a half-pint, which was socially imbibed at the counter.

It was this rough, informal life of a frontier community that Longstreet depicted in his stories, many of which are enlivened with racy character studies and a pungent humor that may sometimes give offense to finicky readers, but which was thoroughly characteristic of those unsqueamish days.

Longstreet was studying law at Yale when his father died. This brought his Northern residence to a close and in 1814 he started home to Augusta. During the years that followed he lived a varied and crowded life. He presided over his plantation; was exceptionally successful as a lawyer; took an active part in politics; entered the race for Congress and doubtless would have been elected, so popular was he, had he not withdrawn from the race on account of the loss of a favorite child.

From being at first a skeptic, he became an ardent believer and whole-heartedly religious in the full Methodist sense, even to the point of giving up his law practice and entering the ministry. His oratorical gifts and his cultural attainments made him a noted preacher and it was not long before he was invited to become the head of Emory College, a Methodist institution in the charming little town of Oxford, Georgia.

He later served as president of two other State colleges, in Mississippi and South Carolina. "Georgia Scenes" dates back to his Yale days, when he was in the habit of entertaining his companions with anecdotes of rustic characters in his almost mythical Southern home town. These stories were relished for their flavor and vivid characterizations and he was urged to put them in writing.

This he began doing when he moved to Augusta, about 1830, and the first one appeared in the Milledgeville Southern Recorder. Most of the choicest ones followed in rapid succession and later when the author established a paper of his own, the Sentinel, they were transferred to its columns.

The stories appeared first in book form in 1835 and met with great success. They were signed "A Native Georgian" and for sometime remained anonymous. Not only were the tales immensely liked by general readers; they drew praise from Poe and John C. Calhoun, and in recognition of their worth the degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred on Longstreet by Yale in 1841.

Mr. Wade's account of this full, attractive life is written in a style in keeping with its subject—picturesque, humorous, and suggestive of the homely, kindly spirit which is middle Georgia's best heritage from early days. The human quality of its scenes and incidents reflects the glow of those mammoth hickory fires around which were jovially discussed the antics of Ned Brace and Ransy Sniffles.

It would be refreshing if Southern orators on patriotic occasions would consult such sources as that offered by Mr. Wade in his life of Longstreet and store their memories with this and kindred data rather than resort to the usual flowery, sentimental "days of Southern chivalry" style.

JULIA COLLIER HARRIS

Patterns

All God's Chillun Got Wings and Welded. By Eugene O'Neill. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Boccaccio's Untold Tale and Other Plays. By Harry Kemp. Brentano's. $2.

OF all the many signs of health in Mr. O'Neill's plays none is more striking than his refusal to concern himself with the question of "what is suitable for representation on the stage," whether by that phrase he meant some question of propriety or of the supposed exigencies of dramatic technique. There is something almost Elizabethan in his determination to put upon the stage whatever seems to him most interesting and compelling in contemporary life without bothering much about the limitations of conventional dramaturgy. Whatever he has wanted to represent he has managed somehow to get upon the boards, hiding it away at the Provincetown if it seemed likely to shock uptown sensibilities and conveying it in some strange form if it was rebellious to ordinary theatrical method. Thus his plays are not only good in themselves but they promise well for others because their bold robustness, their reckless confidence in tackling the largest themes, and the complete absence which they display of any fear of failing through attempting too much are the signs of the lusty youth of a new literature, once more enlarging the horizon of the stage until it includes the whole world. Because, like most innovators, he has not been too much afraid of writing badly he has written very well indeed.

If his influence is ever for anything except good it will be because the externals of his manner are more easily imitated than his matter. "All God's Chillun Got Wings," for instance, presents without any argument and with what appears to be the most fragmentary realism a series of scenes in the life of a white woman married to a Negro. It would be very easy to write a play which would resemble it superficially and yet be very bad, to copy the crude actuality of his dialogue, the simple violence of his action, and the obvious narrative sequence of his short scenes and produce only the most naive of melodramas. But simplicity and directness are only half of his secret; the rest is a psychological subtlety usually hidden by the simplicity of the action but always present, so that his plays, though they deal with primitive people, are never primitive. His characters, it is true, are inarticulate. Their store of words is too small to explain their feelings and they are not always capable of even comprehending their predicament, but while they flounder helplessly the spectator comprehends them. Like the Emperor Jones, like the heroine of "Diff'rent," and like the Hairy Ape, the black man and the white woman mated in the present play are in the grip of forces larger and subtler than their intellects. The essence of the tragedy, however simple and brutal the external events may be, lies not in these events but in the struggle which goes on within the minds of the protagonists between their own characters and forces stronger than they.

The accidents of civilization brought these two representatives of alien races into contact, misfortunes which made them equally outcast joined them together, but their problem could not be solved by them as individuals. They could fly from all outward manifestations of the passions which their breach of the taboo had raised, but they could not fly from the presence in themselves of the same feelings which lead the group to condemn them. Both the man's pathetic effort to justify himself through learning and the woman's hatred of that effort are mute confessions that neither could escape the sense of mysterious inferiority in the one. Intellectually they might convince themselves that no inferiority could exist which was not manifest in character, emotionally they might feel that their love was proof of their equality, but deeper than reason or love was the conviction born of habit and tradition which as individuals they were not strong enough to conquer. They might deny but they could never forget it and from the conflict could come only misery and madness. When near the end the delirious wife enters the room to comfort her husband bending over his books and then, as she leaves, pokes her head through the portieres to shout "Nigger," madness is merely making overt a duality of feeling which could never have been removed. Thus the real protagonist of the piece is not any character but the sense of inferiority, and the play is not melodrama but psychological tragedy.

"Welded" must be put down as one of Mr. O'Neill's failures, for it is conventional both in treatment and material.

While Mr. O'Neill succeeds in the difficult task of expressing important and permanent truths by means of symbols chosen from contemporary reality, Mr. Kemp takes the easier method of emphasizing the permanence of his ideas by setting his action in the timeless realm of fancy. His little plays are full of intelligence and of poetic truth but they can never have the same importance for the stage as those of his fellow-insurgent because the material of most of our art must come from contemporary life. Mr. Kemp shows again the vitality which remains in old themes, but Mr. O'Neill does something more important when he seizes upon material which no previous writer has subdued to literary form. He shows how meaning can be extracted from the clash of contemporary events which are too close to our eyes and ears to seem other than chaotic, and he discovers patterns where none were seen before. He runs a risk which Mr. Kemp escapes, for superficial people see in him only sound and fury, but he is performing a greater service by discovering what every age must discover for itself, namely, that the materials of art and the materials of life are the same.

J. W. KRUTCH

Turkey Through the Eyes of a Turk

Speaking of the Turks. By Mufti-Zade K. Zia Bey. Duffield and Company. $1.75.

HUNDREDS of books have been written about the Turks and their country by persons of many nationalities after longer or shorter sojourn in the country. Many of these have attempted to reveal to the Western world the inside of the minds of the Turkish people. Most such books have been but indifferently successful. Foreigners from Western European countries have been unable to grasp all elements of the situation fully. Non-Turkish natives of the Near East have regularly had different points of view from the Turks, and have sometimes deliberately striven to falsify Turkish ideas. The present book is unique in being written by a Turk who is in full sympathy with the ambitions of his people in their new day, and who, at the same time, is able from long residence in America to grasp the American point of view and to write clearly and idiomatically. He has been assisted in his observations by an American wife.

Zia Bey's descent from a Turkish family which has held high position during four or five centuries gave him entrance to the houses of numerous relatives and family friends, with whom he was soon on such terms of intimacy as to receive their frank opinions in regard to current affairs. The chapters of his book reveal Turkish groups of several sorts under a variety of conditions. Zia Bey and his wife lived at different times in the European quarter of Pera, the Turkish district of Stambul, and on the island of Prinkipo. He visited in houses along the Bosphorus, and conversed with publicists, religious men, Nationalists, American teachers at Robert College, and Turkish teachers and artists. Accordingly, a reader who has followed carefully the smooth flow of his prose has been given from the Turkish point of view information of many sorts.

The time was that of the occupation of Constantinople by Allied troops, while the Nationalist Government was gathering strength at Angora. Turkey is shown in a state of distinct transition, when her people were in many ways endeavoring to expel foreign influences and reconstitute their political and economic life on a new and thoroughly independent basis. The Turks in Constantinople were maintaining a reserved attitude toward the occupying foreigners, endeavoring to contrast their own dignified behavior with what they considered to be the noisy and unworthy conduct of Levantine Greeks and Armenians. Every Turkish man and many a Turkish woman was engaged in some form of business, under the necessity of earning a living in other ways than through military and governmental office. Educated Turks were thinking carefully over the problems of political and religious organization. Departing from the old Moslem attitude of inherent superiority, but abandoning nothing essential in their own view of life, they were inclined to seek for a reconciliation between their ideas and the ideas of the West.

Zia Bey seldom allows himself to be sarcastic or bitter. But Americans who are acquainted with the work and the motives of American missionaries, educators, and relief workers in Turkey cannot but raise objection to occasional misinterpretations of their activities. The chapter entitled A Glimpse of Islam is interesting both for its truth and its error. Zia Bey took some American friends to talk with the theologian Hassan Effendi, who lived in Stambul in a simple house beside a fire-swept area. The old gentleman told them truly how education is the principal foundation of Islam, and affirmed in partial error that the Crusades deprived the East of its wealth and learning. He upheld the scientific accuracy of the Koran, and the equality according to its teachings of all believers in one God; he affirmed that in the early days of Islam, Christian and Jewish soldiers fought side by side with Moslems against idolaters; he believed that a little later "all the Moslem states, although keeping their entire independence, became a federation under the administration of a single Caliph"; and he accused the Western nations of breaking up this unity; he said that the West has taken the riches and lands of the East and does not know that its God is the same as the God of the East. The Western interpretation of history does not square with all of this.

There are few serious errors in the book, and it may be well recommended to Westerners who desire to understand the Turkish point of view as regards recent momentous events in that interesting part of the world.

ALBERT HOWE LYBYER

Books in Brief

Everyday Biology. By J. Arthur Thomson. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

The editors of Doran's Modern Readers' Bookshelf profess to offer "fresh appraisals of many things that interest modern men and women"; to rediscover matters of intense fascination that are buried in meticulous and forbidding scholarship. Quoting James Harvey Robinson, they set out "to remold convictions in the light of added knowledge." Yet "Everyday Biology" differs from a high-school text on elementary biology in little but its unconventional style, which ranges from flippant and jocular to sentimental. The name of Sir J. Arthur Thomson will probably sell the book, and the quotation from Mr. Robinson will give it a purposeful exterior, but the "fresh appraisals" of biological problems have yet to be made, and the fascinating treasure still lies buried in technical journals.

A Short History of International Intercourse. By C. Delisle Burns. London: Allen and Unwin. 3s. 6d.

This book, its author tells us, was written because "there is no history which shows how far civilized life has arisen out of the peaceful cooperation between different peoples." It is essentially a history of peace. Making no pretension to cover the whole field of history or to reveal new facts, it sets forth in vivid style the international origin of modern civilization. The book is written for the general reader and the undergraduate rather than for scholars, but even scholars may find in it a reminder of forgotten facts as well as a valuable statement of a point of view which ought to correct some of the follies of present-day nationalism.

The American Labor Year Book, 1923-4. Edited by Solon De Leon and Nathan Fine. Rand School of Social Science. $3.

It is an encouraging thing that so scientific and impartial a work as the 1923-24 edition of the "American Labor Year Book" can grow out of the bitter and divided condition of the American labor movement. The Rand School, a Socialist institution, has produced a book which discusses the Socialist Party, the Workers (Communist) Party, and Mr. Samuel Gompers with almost equal objectivity. Through its five successive editions the Year Book has been growing into an invaluable encyclopedia of labor, comparing favorably with the "International Labor Year Book" issued in England and with anything published by the International Labor Office in Geneva. Here are tabloid data on industrial conditions, taxes, immigration; labor laws, banks, schools, disputes; and summaries of the trade-union, labor-party, and cooperative movements at home and abroad. The section on the international relations of labor is a particularly careful and comprehensive summary—almost too detailed—from which the professional Red-hunters might derive a great deal of valuable information more accurate than that at their disposal. An epitome of labor history in 1922 and 1923 and a directory of labor organizations, with addresses, the world over, help make this new edition a handbook which must take its place beside the "Statesman's Year-Book" and the "World Almanac" on the desks of editors and students of politics and economics.

Drama Emanuel Reicher

A POEM, a painting, or a symphony must have rare power to survive a generation; how much greater, to be remembered, must be the work of an actor whose creation perishes the moment it is born. Emanuel Reicher, who died in Berlin on May 15, is one of the few actors whose art outlives his life.

When, in 1863, as a 14-year-old boy, Emanuel Reicher sought a passport in his Galician home in order to accompany his father to Russia, he discovered that officially he did not exist. There was no record of his birth. His parents claimed he had been born on June 7, 1849; his godparents, called as witnesses, said June 24. The official recorded the latter date, and thereafter Emanuel Reicher celebrated two birthdays, one private, one official.

His father intended him to become a merchant, but he ran away from home and from the Cracow gymnasium and for a year lived almost penniless with groups of wandering Hungarian actors. Finally, worn out, he returned home, but he still refused a business career. A few months later he was a super and understudy in a Budapest theater, and an actor's illness gave him his first role and his first success. In Vienna he found that his bad German accent stood in his way. He set to work, and a few years later—after engagements in Leipzig and Munich—he met the supreme test, again in Vienna. Laube, director of the Vienna Hofburg Theater, prided himself on his ability to place any actor after a few words, by his accent. Reicher had just been tried out for the second time; "Where do you come from?" Laube asked. It was his highest compliment.

Reicher's first Berlin director was Lautenberg, with whom he had once shared an attic lodging in Budapest. In collaboration with this able man Reicher became a leader in the naturalist movement. He may fairly claim to have discovered a whole series of authors who owed their first great successes to his genius. "Nature is the broom with which we sweep the false and untrue out of the temple of art, clearing ground for the new and creative"—so Reicher wrote to Hermann Bahr. That letter was his program. Its inspiration dated from his Munich days—one scene which he there played throughout in an excited whisper was greeted with astonishment. He was the first to recognize Ibsen's importance, and incited Lautenberg to give "The Wild Duck" its premiere. Ibsen's mystic art was very close to him, always sympathetic to the occult and supernatural.

The high point of his art lies in the years of his work at the Deutsche and the Lessing theaters, under Otto Brahm, with whom he had the profoundest sympathy. There he discovered Gerhart Hauptmann; and later he introduced and advocated Strindberg and Wedekind, Hermann Bahr and Schnitzler. His Rosmer, his John Gabriel Borkmann, his Father (Strindberg), his Florian Geyer were unforgettable. Maximilian Harden once wrote—"We should build altars to him." When the young Max Reinhardt founded his Kleines Theater, Reicher was his friend, adviser, and leading actor. Reinhardt never quite forgave him for returning to Brahm.

In 1899 he toured in Russia and America. His success across the Atlantic was so great that when Brahm died he settled in the United States. He believed that America was on the threshold of a great artistic development. America, he thought, was ready to abandon the star-system, the introduction of which in Germany he so deplored. Last winter he returned to Germany full of ideas and plans for further work in America, and none who saw him in his last parts—although he was 74 years old—would have thought that the end was so near.

The German- and the Jewish-language stage loses in him one of its most selfless leaders. He leaves not only the memory of his art but his gifted children to carry on his artistic inheritance.

ALICE VON HEIDENHEIM

International Relations Section

Superpower in Switzerland

By PAUL LEWINSON

IT does not pay small or powerless nations to be rich. All the records of colonization point this moral, and not a little contemporary history of dealings with "sovereign" states like those, say, of Central and South America. The turn of the wheel now reveals an unexpected opportunity for this sort of imperialism in Europe itself, where one of the freest of democracies and one of the most nationalistic of states is beginning to wonder whether its separate history is not drawing to a close.

That state is Switzerland. Switzerland leads the nations of the European mainland in potential hydro-electric power: 4,000,000 horse-power for a fifteen-hour day, 2,500,000 horse-power for a twenty-four-hour day. Switzerland has available 20,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours per annum, and uses 2,750,000,000. She started to develop these resources some thirty years ago when her first large hydro-electric plant at La Goule on the Doubs was put into operation.

In 1896 the Chèvres plant on the Rhône was opened; in 1898 the great Rheinfelden works on the Rhine, whose capacity is now 45,200 h.-p. Up to the beginning of 1914 the total installation was officially rated at 900,000 h.-p. maximum; from 1914 to the beginning of 1924, 596,000 h.-p. was added, reckoning here the larger plants only; so that the present total rating is well over 1,500,000 a.-p. maximum. The federal Water-Power Bureau estimates the exploitation as 25 per cent of the potentialities, to make due allowance for difference between high- and low-water generation, full- and part-time use of plants, etc.

This would seem to be an achievement, something to be proud of. For a large and militaristic state, yes; but Switzerland views her achievement with a pride not untouched by apprehension. Did not Silesia's coal fields lead to her partition, and the deposits in the Saar valley bring a whole homogeneous population under foreign dominion? What moral does the Ruhr invasion point for helpless but richly endowed territories?

Certain curious developments in the hydro-electric industry since 1915 or 1916 give point to warnings culminating in September, 1923, in a request from the floor of the Bundesrat that the Government investigate the export of energy from Swiss power-plants. In 1921 she sent, via high-tension transmission lines, 462,500,000 kw.-h. to France, Italy, and Germany. In 1922 the estimate rose slightly. Roughly, France takes half of the exported power, Italy a third, and Germany a sixth.

Approximately one-sixth of the total power produced per annum, then, goes into the export trade; in amount of power available for export at any given moment, however, the proportion is much greater—about one-half. The difference is due to the fact that the production of electric power goes on much more continuously for domestic than for foreign consumption.

Again, on the surface, this would seem to be wholly advantageous to Switzerland. Switzerland has water-power to spare; France, Italy, and Germany need it and are willing to pay for it. Why not sell it, like Swiss cheese, Swiss watches, or Swiss milk chocolate? Unfortunately a little consideration must make it obvious that electricity as a commodity for export is not in a class with cheese and chocolate. Electric power is primarily a service. Ordinary goods can be stored against a shortage. Electricity can not. Ordinary goods can be bought in the open market when the usual source of supply is cut off. Electricity, supplied over expensive and fixed transmission lines, can not. Ordinary goods have common substitutes quickly available. But it would take from eighteen months to two years to build sufficient steam-generating plants in the French provinces on the Swiss border to cover the withdrawal of electric-power supply on the part of Switzerland.

The city of Milan already depends on Swiss electricity for a large measure of its street lighting and tramway service. So do many towns in northern France. In Italy and France and Germany as well great industrial undertakings depend on the uninterrupted transmission of power from the great Brusio, Wäggital, and Olten-Gösigen plants. Were the export of power suddenly to cease, whole provinces in these countries would be plunged into darkness, their transit facilities cut off, their chief industries ruined.

As might have been anticipated, industrials in the countries dependent on Switzerland for electrical power have already taken steps to secure control of the Swiss hydro-electric industry. In the latest list of power companies issued by the federal Water-Power Bureau, three important plants are noted as under Swiss-German control, one is under Swiss-Italian direction, and one Swiss-French. It is no secret, however, that this does not nearly exhaust the list of foreign, and especially French, interests involved in Swiss power plants.

Even though energy export shows a day-by-day favorable balance on the books of the power companies, it does not work out profitably, in terms of cold cash, for the general economic life of the nation. In many cases electricity is exported to heavy industries competing directly with Swiss firms; German and French industrials have even found it profitable to put up new plants in border provinces for the sake of winning away from Switzerland some trade advantage with the help of the exported energy. In Germany, for example, the power drawn from the Lonza works is largely employed in the manufacture of carbide. Thus a Swiss industry already greatly depressed by the chaos of the European economic situation has been brought to the verge of bankruptcy.

More directly irritating to the Swiss citizen, however, is the undoubted fact that he is obliged to pay a far higher rate for electric current than the foreign consumer. The exploitation of Swiss water-power for electric current is carried on by private enterprise to the extent of some 59 per cent, by cooperative bodies and local authorities 21 per cent, by corporations controlled jointly by public and private shareholders 13 per cent, and by the federal government 7 per cent. All four types are involved in export contracts, and—the privately owned concerns fixing the conditions of the trade by reason of their numerical strength—all export power at rates that must necessarily mean a net loss on the quantities exported. Rate schedules are not available for the highly competitive export business, but Dr. F. Frey-

Fürst, an engineer of high standing, has calculated that they cannot average more than 1.20 to 1.35 centimes (Swiss) per kw.-h. A few enterprises have contracted at from 3 to 4 centimes; on the other hand, some (like the Lonza works which have crippled the carbide industry) get less than one centime. Other authorities bear out these figures. The cost of production, reckoned from the figures of the most recently installed plants, runs from 6 to 2.1 centimes per kw.-h.—on the basis of maximum exploitation. Since, however, most power plants slacken production during the night, and many are wholly idle during the winter months, these figures probably require appreciable weighting to give a true picture of the discrepancy between cost and export prices. The difference comes out of the pockets of the domestic consumer.

Two examples will suffice to show what results from such conditions in Swiss industry. The Fischer Steel Company in Schaffhausen, faced with the prospect of having to pay 8 centimes per kw.-h. for power, discontinued the use of its electric smelting furnaces. The same power-plant from which it drew its energy, however, was at the time under contract for the delivery of energy to France and Germany at from 1.1 to 2.7 centimes per kw.-h., some of which went into smelting furnaces across the border. Near Zürich the lines of a transmission company subsidiary to one of the largest hydro-electric plants in Switzerland carry export current at 1 and 2 centimes per kw.-h. under the very noses of Swiss manufacturers who cannot get power at such advantageous rates.

Financial overexpansion explains this situation. The power companies must export cheaply to meet overhead and fixed charges, since their plants have to be kept running in any case. Thoughtless competitive building of hydro-electric stations dates back to about the middle of the war. Even before 1914 construction had slackened from fear of overproduction. The uncertainties of the war increased such hesitation. But by 1916 the Swiss coal shortage was so great, and the certainty of profits from munitions-making by electro-chemical and electro-metallurgical processes so well established that a great revival set in. After 1918 there was another large increment, due to the promulgation of a law making investment in power-plant projects much more favorable. Under it the state conceded the right to concessionnaires to sue a public authority as well as private persons in regard to their holdings, gave the right to buy and sell concessions, and forbade the withdrawal of concessions by public authority save for reasons of urgent public necessity and upon indemnification.

During this period it was that the Nordostschweizerische Kraftübertragungs A. G. ("NOK") increased its capitalization first from 18,000,000 Swiss francs to 36,000,000 (1918), and then to 70,000,000 francs (1920). In 1918 too the NOK established its subsidiary the Schweizerische Kraftübertragungs A. G. ("SK"), to expand high-tension delivery services for internal and external transmission. And again, in 1920 the SK company absorbed four other organizations (including one municipal power-plant) and raised its capitalization from 6,000,000 to 9,000,000 francs.

The momentum of favorable conditions due to the war carried investors over into the post-bellum period. Then, with the buying power of her neighbors greatly depreciated and her own currency at a premium in Italy, Germany, and France, Switzerland found her inflated hydro-electric industry in a critical position.

The situation called for two remedies, according to the great private power companies: first, of course, to raise domestic rates; second, to increase the export trade, even at less than cost, in order to cover as much as possible of the expense of running the newly expanded industry. A third method of dealing with the situation was found, but it was hardly proclaimed in public by the power interests: to transfer home industries into the border provinces of France and Germany and operate them there on a low wage scale and at low costs for raw materials, with cheap power exported from Switzerland.

The defense put forward by the hydro-electric companies is vulnerable in many spots. "Laissez-faire"—free play for competitive forces in the power industry—figures largely. But the chief grievance of local consumers has never been met: that Swiss industry would be glad to take advantage of the exploited water-power if it were offered internally at the same low rates that the foreign user enjoys. It is not so offered partly because the foreign element in the directorates of the great power plants sees to it that the "surplus" is exported; partly also because it is cheaper to transmit at high voltage over a main transmission line than to deliver more or less at retail. All the export of power which deprives a potential bidder in Switzerland of energy is in evasion of the federal statute which requires the hydro-electric companies to offer in domestic trade at the foreign rate any quantity of power for which they seek an Ausfuhrbewilligung. But in Switzerland as elsewhere the constitution is a small matter between friends.

It is denied that there would be any real surplus of electricity for export if the potential internal consumption were properly developed. Certainly it is hard to see how the existence of a surplus can be proved under the differential rate schedules which exist. One engineer has made a statistical analysis from which he calculates that only 35 per cent of the Swiss population could be supplied with heat alone on an average January day, were all the 20,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of annual potential water-power harnessed to generators. The power companies insist that only surplus energy is exported, although it appears from the journal of the Schweizer-Wasserwirtschaft Verband (to cite but one more statistical discrepancy) that in 1922, 242,000,000 kw.-h. of summer power was exported, and only 10 per cent less of the much scarcer winter power. Whatever price differences exist, it is maintained, are due to the advantages of wholesale production, and to the cheapness of laying a few high-tension mains to the frontier as compared with the installation of a network of local transmission lines.

To the charge that they are endangering Switzerland's independence by committing themselves to foreign deliveries and by thus inviting foreign investment if not control in their own organizations, the spokesmen of the power companies return varying answers. Far from endangering Swiss independence, they have claimed, they lay foreign industrials under an obligation to Switzerland. "As though," remarks Dr. Frey-Fürst, "a small peasant farmer could insure his own welfare by mortgaging his holdings to a powerful neighboring landlord in order to threaten him with a refusal to pay interest."

The needs of the situation are quite clear. Either federal ownership or a rigidly enforced official scheme for the further internal development of Switzerland's water-power must supplant the present helter-skelter competitive arrangements.

The Press in the Soviet Republics

THE Fifth of May is observed throughout the Soviet Union as the Annual Press Day. The significance of this day is discussed in the Moscow monthly Journalist, the organ of the Section of Press Workers of the Union of Educational Workers:

Press Day is the holiday not only of the workers of the press but of all the workers of the Soviet Union who . . . have taken into their possession the greatest tool for the organization of the proletarian state and the spreading of knowledge—the newspaper, the magazine, the book. . . . For us who are directly engaged in the work of the press the Fifth of May is the beginning of a new year. On this day we take stock of our successes and achievements. From this day we look back over the road which we have traveled. From the experiences of the past year, from Press Day to Press Day, we gain our perspective for the future. . . .

On the occasion of this last Press Day the Journalist, in its May issue, carried a detailed review of the development and achievements of the year. The review covers the period from April 1, 1923, to March 1, 1924. During this period the daily circulation of all newspapers in the Soviet Union increased from 1,950,000 copies on April 1, 1923, to 2,520,000 copies on March 1, 1924. The number of newspapers during the same period decreased from 560 to 498. Thus by March 1 the circulation of the Soviet press nearly touched the pre-war level of the whole Russian press. The total circulation of the latter in 1914 amounted to a little over 2,700,000 copies daily. By the end of May, according to later reports in the Soviet press, this figure had already been passed, and the Soviet press is well on its way to reach the goal set for the current year: a daily circulation of 5,000,000 copies by the end of 1924.

A vivid illustration of the processes of the strengthening of the Soviet press is furnished by the Moscow Pravda, which publishes daily the figures of its circulation. These figures show a remarkable and steady gain. On January 1, 1924, its circulation was a little over 100,000. On May 26 it reached a circulation of 286,933. The growth of this newspaper may be seen from its circulation figures for a few days during last May taken at random:

May 17.....	267,948 copies
May 24.....	280,194 copies
May 26.....	286,933 copies

Its increase from the beginning of January, 1924, to the end of April was over 112,000.

Other leading newspapers which have shown great gains during the past year are:

The Moscow Gudok (Whistle), organ of the transport workers, which increased its daily circulation from 85,000 in April, 1923, to 230,000 in March, 1924;

The Moscow Peasant Gazette, which had 60,000 circulation in January, 1924, and reached a daily circulation of 125,000 in March, 1924;

The Moscow Workers' Gazette—from 135,000 in April, 1923, to 185,000 in March, 1924;

The Ekaterinburg Ural Worker—from 16,000 in April, 1923, to 60,000 in May, 1924;

The Kharkov Proletarian—from 18,000 in April, 1923, to 55,000 in March, 1924; etc.

The following table shows the development of the Soviet newspapers according to their several groups:

Newspaper Group	Number of Publications		Daily Circulation
	Apr. 1, 1923	Apr. 1, 1924	Apr. 1, 1923	Apr. 1, 1924
Peasant press	51	117	149,000	376,000
Press of the national minorities (Non-Russian)	83	108	149,000	238,000
Workers'	43	43	462,000	655,000
Red Army	16	15	43,000	71,000
Workers' Youth	34	39	15,000	34,000
Trade Unions	24	15	138,000	310,000
Cooperative	8	14	5,000	10,000
General	298	147	989,000	826,000

Thus the greatest growth was shown by the peasant newspapers which increased their circulation by 153 per cent, and by the press of the national minorities which increased its circulation by 59 per cent. The greatest significance is attached to the growth of the peasant press which is gaining readers in strata which had previously remained practically untouched. Special effort is made to intensify the process of the growth of the number of peasant readers and to bring newspapers in greater numbers into the villages. The immediate goal is to reach a circulation of 2,000,000 copies for the peasant press.

The past year has also been the first in which the Soviet press has netted considerable profits. While the price of newspapers went down from 20 to 30 per cent most of the newspapers finished their year with fair profits. The Moscow Izvestia alone had a profit of over 800,000 gold rubles ($400,000) during the year. During the last quarter of 1923 and the first quarter of 1924 only 150,000 gold rubles ($75,000) were spent in subsidies for newspapers in the whole union which carried on with a loss. Of these 68 were non-Russian newspapers of the national minorities which received subsidies to the amount of 105,600 gold rubles, 41 peasant papers received 35,400 rubles, and 9 others received 9,000 rubles.

Contributors to This Issue

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON, author of "The Story of Mankind," "The Story of the Bible," and other books, will contribute to The Nation stories and sketches of the other conventions and the campaign.

MOLLIE BEST, formerly of the staff of McClure's Magazine, is well known as a monologist and story-teller.

J. W. KRUTCH, assistant professor of English at the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, is The Nation's regular critic of fiction.

IDA TREAT contributed an article on the French elections to The Nation of June 11.

HARRY ELMER BARNES, formerly of Clark University, is now professor of history at Smith College.

FLOYD DELL's latest book, "Looking at Life," is a collection of his critical work.

JULIA COLLIER HARRIS, whose life of her father-in-law, Joel Chandler Harris, appeared in 1919, is editor of the book page in the Columbus Enquirer-Sun.

ALBERT HOWE LYBYER, professor of history at the University of Illinois, was technical adviser to the American commission on mandates in Turkey during the peace conference.

ALICE VON HEIDENHEIM, The Nation's representative in Berlin, is an intimate friend of the Reichert family.

